Reviews of Senator Sumner's Speech—The Seizure of the Mary Powell.

LONDON, Saturday, May 1.

The English Press continue to review Mr. SUMNER's speech on the Alabama claims, which occasions no little anxiety in political circles.

The Times, at the conclusion of a long article, says the Queen's proclamation of neutrality at the beginning of the rebellion was a prohibition, not an authorization of blockade-runners. The only real evil caused by it was the position given to the Alabama in English ports, which point would have come within the operation of the rejected treaty.

Instructions have been sent to Commodore PHILLIMORE, commanding the British West India Squadron, to demand of the Spanish authorities in Cuba the restoration of the brig Mary Lowell and an apology for her seizure.

SPAIN.

Paraguayan Affairs—The Partizans of Lopez Active.

LONDON, Saturday, May 1.

The mails from Rio Janeiro contain details of the war in Paraguay.

The partizans of President Lopez were numerous and active in the Cerroleon and Logoa Districts where they were pursuing a guerrilla warfare. The allies sent a gunboat expedition up the Parana River, which had returned and reported that no fortifications had been discovered on the banks.

PARANHOS, with 3,000 men, was on the eve of marching for Villa Rica, which was still in the possession of the Paraguayans.

MEXICO.

Success of the Rebel Colonel Palacio—Guerrilla Warfare.

SAN FRANCISCO, Friday April 30.

The California and Mexico Mail steamer Montana brings Mazatlan advices to the 20th of April.

The insurgent Colonel PALACIO, after leaving Culiacau, made his way to the town of Tutela, his force having increased to four hundred men by recruits on the road.

General DARA was sent after him from Mazatlan, and from reports that have not been contradicted, though the Government keeps everything quiet on the subject, an engagement occurred between the insurgents and the Government troops, in which the latter lost two hundred men. It is stated that General DARA's force was crippled by desertions. The battle appears to have taken place at Tamazula, 110 miles east of Caliacon, in Sinaloa.

In the State of Durango, JOAQUIN CONTRERAS has pronounced in favor of PALACIO, and, it is presumed, will join him immediately.

If PALACIO can sustain himself one month longer he will probably have 1,200 or 2,000 men, and may succeed in establishing the long-desired Northwestern Confederacy.

A guerrilla chief named CAUZE had captured the town of Osaree (?) and liberated the prisoners there, who enlisted under the robber, and they then captured the arms of the miners at the Lajo mines and levied a contribution of $3,000. Assistance was immediately sent from Mazatlan, and the guerrillas were surprised and dispersed.

During the affray two foreigners were killed—one a German, the other a Swiss—neither of whom had taken part in the disturbance.

General GONZALES had escaped from prison in Durango.

The danger of General CANTO's punishment appears to be past.

The United States steamer Mohongo was at Mazatlan.

The Late Dispatches from Minister Rosecrans—Affairs in Mexico—The Public Debt Statement.

Special Dispatches to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Saturday, May 1.

The dispatches which were received yesterday at the State Department from General ROSECRANS, our Minister at Mexico, refer to the condition of the country, more especially to its financial position. It is understood that he recommends and urges the negotiation of a loan to the Juarez Government, as security for which the United States will receive a mortgage on the Province of Sonora and other contiguous territory. Minister ROSECRANS also asks that he be retained as our representative to Mexico for some time longer to enable him to carry out negotiations to this effect.

Your correspondent has official authority for the statement to-night that there is not the remotest probability that these views of Minister ROSENCRANS will be favorably entertained by the Administration. The President has always felt a strong interest in Mexican affairs, and is probably better informed as to the condition and wants of that country than any other man in the United States. He has a policy in reference to Mexico which he intends to carry out, and Mr. NELSON will receive very full instructions on the subject.

The reply to General ROSECRANS' dispatches will be to the effect that the new Minister, who will sail in a few days, will present the views of the present Administration to the Mexican authorities on questions as they arise.

GENERAL LEE AND THE PRESIDENT.

General ROBERT E. LEE, late Commander of the Confederate armies, had an interview with President GRANT to-day by appointment. The interview was a very brief one, and it is understood that no reference whatever was made to political affairs. It is not improbable, however, that the President will ask General LEE's views of the condition and wants of the South before he leaves the city, which will not be for some days to come.

A message was received from the Governor vetoing the bill relating to the Jordan Academy and Free School in District No. 4, in the town of Elbridge, Onondaga County. The Jordan Academy was constituted by special act in academical department in Free School District No. 4, in the manner provided by the laws of 1864, being a general law passed that year to revise and consolidate the acts relating to public instruction. The Jordan Academy passed into the charge of the Board of Education of the district. It was provided by the special act (1867) that the Board of Education might fix the terms of tuition. But by the subsequent passage of an act, known as the Free School law, the privilege of requiring payment from pupils was taken from all the departments (the academical included) of the public schools. From the operation of this general provision, the Jordan Academy seeks exemption. It would get the benefit of the Public School system, and yet be at liberty to require payment for tuition from some of its pupils. The teachers and pupils of this academical department are reported by the Board of Education as Common School teachers and pupils, and, consequently, are counted toward the pro rata share of the public money assigned to the district. The bill is without precedent and would establish a bad one.

The veto was sustained by 66 to 4.

Adjourned till Monday morning.

AFFAIRS IN ENGLAND.

The Season—A Week of Banquets—Women's Rights—The Irish Church in Parliament—An Advance Epitaph.

From Our Own Correspondent.

LONDON, Saturday, April 17, 1869.

The weather interests me so much that I take it for granted my readers have an equal attraction for meteorological information. After a warm February, with birds and flowers, we have had a cold March. The buds kept as close as they could, as so, I presume did the birds; but the first weeks of April have been like June. At 5 o'clock in the morning the birds fill the air with a perfect jubilation of song; the orchards, pear trees and cherry trees are in all their glory of white blossoms, and the deep rich green meadow lands are warmed with golden butter-cups, fragrant cowslips and pale yellow primroses. The soft sunshine fills the world, the air is balm, and you wonder, for the time, what in his climate an Englishman ever found to grumble at. We are ten degrees north of New-York, and the first of April brought us more flowers and foliage than I ever saw there a month later. Now, as I write these lines, I can see at least a thousand fruit trees, each one glory of bloom. By May-day England will be a big bouquet of apple-blossoms.

A WEEK OF BANQUETS.

This has been a week of banquets. There have been religious, political, literary and artistic dinners. Everything that excites an Englishman strikes to his stomach and gives him a tremendous appetite. Whatever work is before him, he feels sure that he can eat his way through it. If he feels charitable, he dines. The way to feed the hungry is first of all to eat a good dinner himself. He expresses his loyalty, his heroworship, all his noble sentiments in the same way—first plenty to eat, then toasts and sentiments.

The first banquet of the week was that to Mr. DICKENS, at Liverpool. The incense of adulation, from which Americans shrink so sensitively, and of which Englishmen are so fond, was burnt under Mr. DICKENS' nose on this occasion by Lord HOUGHTON, (Moncton Milnes,) Lord DUFFERIN, who said that all peoples of English descent and speech, whatever their feelings to England, were loyal to Mr. DICKENS, Mr. ANTHONY TROLLOPE, &c. Lord HOUGHTON expressed his regret that Mr. DICKENS had not gone into politics and become a peer. Mr. DICKENS is usually very happy in his dinner speeches, but the incense seems to have been too much for him on this occasion. His reason for not being a politician, or accepting a peerage, is that when he chose a literary career he determined to stick to that, to live by it, and to be content with its honors and rewards. Mr. DICKENS is now giving what are announced as his farewell readings, and the members of the dramatic profession in London, engaged every night, have asked him to give them some in the morning. He is too fond of the drama and its interpreters to refuse them the pleasure and benefit of hearing him.

The banquet of the Fishmongers to the Archbishop of Canterbury is the next in order. The Prime Warden is a north countryman, and an old friend of Dr. TAIT; and so he asked the Archbishop to dine with him, and got all the distinguished people he could to do him honor. First came that nice little German gentleman, the Prince of TECK, husband of the Princess MARY of Cambridge; then Lord LAWRENCE, late Governor-General of India, sporting the blushing honors of his new peerage; Sir ROUNDELL PALMER, who renounced the honor of being Lord Chancellor, and £10,000 a year, because he could not go with Mr. GLADSTONE on disestablishment; the President of the Royal Academy, soon to open its new galleries, said to be the finest in Europe—if they had but something to hang in them—and a power of the reverend clergy.

The dinner, of course, was of heavy magnificence. Then came the incense. Queen, Prince and Princess of WALES, Prince TECK, Army and Navy, and a special glorification of the Archbishop, and even the Archbishop's wife. All his works praised him. He had collected a large fund, as Bishop of London, and built many churches. In his zeal he had gone to stable-yards and preached to omnibus drivers and lads on Sundays. If we can believe this head Fishmonger, St. Peter and other fishermen at the other end of the apostolic succession, were not to be compared with the Archbishop of Canterbury, who does not make tents, and has $50,000 gold a year.

In the general process of soaping and shampooing, the Prime Warden and his fellow Fishmongers had one bitter disappointment. Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON, the late American Minister, was not present. The Prime Warden, in apologizing for his absence—which was very necessary, as the presence of the American Minister has come to be as indispensable at a great banquet as turtle soup and soft sawder,—said "he had been very sorry to see in the papers that morning a rather abrupt telegram." How could he expect a telegram to be other than abrupt, at the prices they charge for them? People who pay a sovereign for every two words are not apt to indulge in complimentary circumlocutions. And to think that Englishmen must dine for years to come, perhaps, without Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON!

Sir ROUNDELL PALMER, the Irish Church martyr, did his best to console the Prime Fishmonger under his bereavement. With all its troubles, he held that the present time is better than any time past. Not only do Archbishops of Canterbury have ten thousand a year without the slightest risk of having their heads cut off, or being sent to the Tower, or of anything worse than disestablishment—but an Englishman is no longer obliged to make his house a castle as in the days of the Plantagenets, or to lose his head, as in the days of the Tudors, or tolerate vice, with the Stuarts, or be robbed at Hounslow, as in Queen ANNE's time, by Irish Bishops, or all get drunk at dinner like their grandfathers.

THE IRISH CHURCH.

The House went into Committee on the Irish Church bill on Thursday night. Mr. NEWDEGATE led the forlorn hope against it, with a motion to postpone its consideration for six months. There was a succession of no Popery and no surrender speeches, all on one side. The Pope had got Ireland, and meant to have England. The Jesuits are busy. Maynooth is to be endowed with Protestant money. The Constitution is being destroyed. "Despotism is not the less despotism," said Mr. NEWDEGATE, "because it is Democratic; and so sensible of this are the people and Senate of the United States, that they are trying in every way to qualify that despotism." And then his soul was harrowed up by seeing members of Parliament, day by day, talking in the lobbies with Archbishop MANNING, whom he characterized as "the most insinuating of tyrants." Another member made a vain appeal to the loyalty of the House, in describing the disaffection now existing in Ireland. Feinianism, he said, was as bad as ever, and Ribbonism worse. Saddest of all, it was extremely difficult to get up even the semblance of a cheer for Prince ARTHUR, now on a visit to Dublin. Mr. GLADSTONE replied to these gentlemen as a matter of form. Mr. DISRAELI quietly surrendered, and advised Mr. NEWDEGATE not to go to a division. But he could not take advice, and was beaten by 126 majority.

Now all the details will be settled, it would seem, by strict party vote. Mr. GLADSTONE will probably accept a few unimportant amendments, but the bill will be passed and sent to the Lords by Whitsuntide.

While disestablishment thus goes on triumphantly in the House, a compact majority trampling down all opposition, and at times getting up an impatient row to silence a troublesome speaker, the Irish Church Bishops, clergy and laity, have met in Dublin to utterly denounce the whole porceeding—they refuse all compromise; they will make no surrender. They despise the honors of war; they will not keep their side arms and baggage; they will not even accept the inevitable. They reject with scorn the advice given them to set their house in order and save what they can out of the wreck of the Establishment. The whole thing is to them a great wrong, a great insult, spoliation, confiscation, downright robbery with violence, and very loudly do they protest against it. "Are religious matters to be settled according to the wishes of the people of Ireland?" they ask. "If religious matters, why not political?" If the Irish people were consulted, there would be Repeal of the Union to-morrow, and the Queen's supremacy would soon be set aside on the same principle; nor are the rights of the landlords in any better condition. Try the wishes of the people on that question. All an Irishman's traditions with respect to the soil of his country are of dispossession, confiscation, wrongs, spoliations. He disputes at every step the exercise of the landlord's rights, because in his heart he denies those rights altogether. The real cry of Irishmen is, not Church disestablishment, but "Ireland for the Irish, and down with invading England." This is the substance of some of the eloquent speeches in the Church Conference, and all breathe the same spirit. The Conference is the "immovable body" we read about, and the "irresistible force" is Mr. GLADSTONE'S 126 majority in the House of Commons, with the will of the nation behind it. Disestablishment is the first installment of what England is ready to pay for peace and security. Union is looked upon as a necessity of geographical position, but to secure a peaceful and willing union with Ireland, England will no more regard the interests of landlords than those of the Church. Mr. GLADSTONE is no more ready to disestablish one, than Mr. BRIGHT will be, when his turn comes, to dispossess the other. And if an Irish Parliament on College Green, and the green flag flying from Dublin Castle, were a sine qua non—if Ireland were to persist in demanding the same rights that have been granted to Hungary by Austria, under the same penalty, who can doubt that they would be granted. CHARLES I. and WILLIAM III. were ready to give religious and political equality to Ireland, under the dread of French intervention. America has more power now to serve Ireland than France has ever had. Irishmen, here and in America, have the game in their own hands, if they choose to play it.

Mr. GLADSTONE'S temper, which his friends say is only a little added earnestness of manner, breaks out at every attempt to stay the progress of his bill; but never was a majority better in hand. There is not the semblance of a cave. Last night Mr. DISRAELI'S first amendment was negatived by 123 majority. He wished to preserve the connection between the Irish and English Church, even if the former is disestablished, under the Queen's supremacy. The Roman Catholic Church had its head—and if there is to be religious equality in Ireland, the Protestant Church ought to be left in as good a condition—but the House was afraid it would be called upon to provide heads for the Presbyterians, Methodists, Baptists, Plymouth Brethren, and all the other acephalous denominations. Meantime the Conservative papers take comfort in republishing the following ante-mortem epitaph on the "renegade and traitor" who is doing all the mischief:

Intensely anxious to do right,
He marred great abilities by great inconsistencies.
Born a Conservative,
He became a Radical.
Having resigned high office
Upon High-Church principles,
In later life he advocated measures
Which would practically have separated
The Church from the Nation
And reduce her to the position of a sect.
As a financier, unsurpassed;
As a statesman, found lamentably wanting;
As an orator, almost unrivaled;
As a reasoner, too clever to be sound.
Of varied accomplishments as a scholar,
Of the character of the English people most ignorant.
He gave to his country the luxury of cheap claret,
And he did his best
Unsuccessfully
To destroy the British Constitution.

AFFAIRS IN ITALY.

The Maestro Rossini—The Vespaccis—Scientific Copies—Public Instruction—The Season.

From Our Own Correspondent.

FLORENCE, Monday, April 12, 1869.

This is the day for the reunion of Parliament, and more than anything else the people are interested to hear the story which the Minister of Finance has to tell. But the general facts are known already, and the details will mostly concern those who with the Government have accounts of their own to make up. The Italian financial system is such a mass of confusion, that one must be a pretty good student of bookkeeping to be able to make it out. The Italians may understand it well enough, for there are figures enough published, but there seems to be a want of simplicity of statement. The balance sheet of the army, of public works, and of public instruction is first to be discussed. The session does not promise to be one of great interest, but a week's talk may develop some phase of policy worthy of notice.

THE MAESTRO ROSSINI.

It is known that at the time the death of ROSSINI was announced, VERDI took the initiative in a project for having his memory honored by a special musical celebration. It was suggested that the first among living Italian composers should be invited to take part, so as to give to the occasion all possible distinction. The scheme is in a way to be carried out. The anniversary of ROSSINI'S death is named as the time for the musical ceremony, and

CURRENT LITERATURE.

A SONG OF AGE.

Who mourns? Flow on, delicious breeze!
Who mourns, though youth and strength go by?
Fresh leaves invest the vernal trees,
Fresh airs will drown my latest sigh.
What am I but a part outworn
Of earth's great whole that lifts more high
A tempest-freshened brow each morn
To meet pure beams and azure sky?

Thou world-renewing breath, sweep on,
And waft earth's sweetness o'er the wave!
That earth will circle round the sun
When God takes back the life he gave!
To each his turn! Even now I feel
The feet of children press my grave,
And one deep whisper o'er it steal—
"The soul is His who died to save."

THE EASTER EGG.

From the Easter Annual.

It stood on the mantel-piece of the best parlor, in a little ornamental egg-cup of gilt filagree work. I noticed it as soon as I entered the room, and wondered what it was. A close scrunity showed me that it was intended for an "Easter egg." There were the variegated hues unmistakably plain, and underneath, on a gold plate on the stand, were inscribed the words. "To Joseph Clarke, from A. C. and S. C., in remembrance of Easter, 1850." That settled the question as to its being an Easter egg at once; but, at the same time, it roused my curiosity to know what event this novel souvenir was intended to commemorate.

I had just taken up my quarters at the "Crown and Dolphin," with the intention of spending a few days of my Easter vacation at that venerable hostelry, which was one of those old-fashioned country inns—big, rambling, many-gabled houses—well known to travelers in the old stage-coaching days. A good many of them exist still up and down England, but their glory has departed, and there is an air of solitude and desolation about them like that which reigned in the halls of Balclutha, over which Ossian sang his melancholy dirge. Mine host was Joseph Clarke, a portly, red-faced, plethoric personage, whose natural irascibility was not softened by constant attacks of gout. However, he was civil to me, his only guest, and was rather a pleasant companion of an evening, when he and I smoked our long clays together beside the parlor fire. Every morning at breakfast that egg used to attract my attention, and every day I resolved that I would satisfy my curiosity by asking old Clark the history of it; but, somehow, I felt diffident in his presence. It might be some family matter, into which a stranger had no right to pry; so I held my peace.

One morning—Easter Monday, in fact—I was sitting as usual in the best parlor, in solitary grandeur, when a knock came at the door, and then mine host and his wife entered. There was an appearance of confusion in their looks, which puzzled me. The mystery was soon solved by mine host, who blurted out: "Mr. Morley, Sir, my old 'oman and me, Sir, has made bold to come and ask a favor of ye, Sir, it's our wedding-day, and we allers has a family party. There's only sons and darters, and sons and darters-in-law, and gran'children—a matter of a dozen, not more. And would ye mind takin' a bit o' dinner with us, Sir?"

Before I had time to reply, Mrs. Clarke broke in: "Which, I know, Sir, it's not for the likes o' you to dine with sich as us in a general way; but to-day bein' our weddin'-day, and you bein' alone, Sir, we made bold, Sir, to think you would not be above eatin' a bit o' dinner with us."

I very readily accepted the invitation, much to the delight of the worthy couple; and to cut matters short, a very good dinner we had. I insisted upon the whole party sojourning to the best parlor after dinner, when mine host produced some choice port from the cellar. It being Easter Monday, and I having been, so to speak, admitted into the bosom of the family, I ventured to broach the question of the egg. If not of a private nature, what did it relate to? A general laugh, and a husky chuckle from old Joseph himself, suggested that there was something amusing connected with the egg; and it didn't require much pressing to induce Mr. Clarke to tell the tale, which he did as follows:

"Let's see, it must be goin' on for fifteen years since that happened. Howsumever, I'll begin at the beginnin'. Ye've, maybe, noticed that big house opposite. Well, there a Dr. Carter lives. He's a widowes—wife's been dead this ten years, I suppose; he has a couple o' darters, but they're married and settled elsewhere. It's one o' them as I'm goin' to tell ye of. Deary me! I remember when them darters of hissen was young girls—what romps they used to have! D'ye see that round hole in the big door there, close to the latch? Well, that's where they used to stand a tip-toe and peep through when they heard any gentlemen a-drivin' up here, and we used to have a power o' young college gents then—far more than now. But I'm gettin' off the line. Well, a matter o' fifteen years ago, there was a young chap stayin' here a learnin' medicine with Dr. Carter,—a Frenchman he was, Alfred Chabot they called him. A merry, nice-lookin' little feller he was,—far decenter to look at and talk to than ever I thought a furriner could ha' been. He was fond o' comin' here of an evenin', and would bring his fiddle with him, and sing to it as sweet as a bird. And he was that amusin' with it all, that I tell ye, I've many a time thought I'd ha' died with laughin' at him. I think he must ha' had some larks with the young ladies opposite, too, when the old man was away, for I've heard 'em laughin' in the garden like good 'uns, many a time. And my wife, she says to me one day—

"'I tell 'ee what, Joe,—that young French chap 'll be spliced to one o' them Miss Carters afore long, or my name ain't Betty Clarke.'

"'D'ye think so, Betty?' says I. For, to tell the truth, I never cast a thought on the matter afore,—women is such sharper hands than men, ye see, at findin' out them sort o' things.

"'Think it?' says she, 'I'm just certain of it; and what's more, 'tis Miss Susie, the younger one, he's arter. Haven't I watched 'em lookin' at one another in church, so sly, when they thought nobody's eye was on 'em? La! bless yer, 'tis we women folks that have the eyes; you men are as blind as bats.'

"Well, after what Betty said, I thought I'd look at my lady and gentleman in church the next Sunday I was there. But never a sign did I see, bless ye, pass between 'em; their eyes seemed glued to their prayer-books, leastways hers were. What they were at in sermon time, I can't tell ye, for I generally listens to our parson with my eyes shut; it must bother a man, ye know, when he's preachin', to see folks all staring at him with their eyes wide open; so I always shuts mine.

"This young Chabot, he lived in lodgings in the village, in the very house where our Lott lives now. Old Billy Hawes and his wife lived there then, and Billy says to me, when we was smokin' our pipes together one evenin' beside the club-room fire:

"'Joe,' says he, 'my old 'oman tells me Dr. Carter won't let that young French chap have his darter.'

"'Nonsense!' says I, 'you don't mean to say young Chabot has asked for one of 'em?'

"'Ay! that he has, Joe; and old Carter stormed and swore dreadful at him, so my Sally says; but how she come to hear on't, unless the young genelm'n told her hisself, I don't know.'

"'Which of 'em did he ask for—did Sally say?'

"'Well, the young 'un, I believe.'

"'Ah! then,' says I, 'ye may depend upon it, it's because he didn't choose t'other. Ye see the young 'un is young, and can afford to wait; but the old 'un, she is gettin' on in years, and it'll be hard to get rid of her soon.'

"'Well, there's a deal o' truth in that, Joe,' says Billy. Just then my missis came in, and Billy had to go a minute arter; so we didn't have any more talk about old Carter and his darter that night.

"Howsumever, young Chabot stayed on and seemed as friendly with the old man as ever, so I began to think that Billy Hawes' misis had been gammonin' him with some cock-and-bull story as wasn't true.

"Well, time went on. Christmas came and went, and a mortal cold Christmas it was. Poor old Billy Hawes, he was laid up that bad with it that I never saw a sight of him for three months arterwards.

"On Easter Monday, old Carter went to Norfolk on some business or other. The day after he had gone, about 6 o'clock in the evenin', young Chabot comes into the bar, and asks to see—

"'Mr. Clarke, I've got a friend here who has come to see me. We're going to travel up to London to-night by the last train from Welbeach. I want to know if you'll drive us over to Welbeach in your shandry. I've got a couple of small portmanteaus, and that's all our luggage.'

"'What time d'ye want to start from this?' I asked.

"'Oh, a little after ten,—say a quarter past.'

"'Very well, then, Sir,' says I; 'I've no objection to drive ye; but I hope ye'll not keep me waitin', for it's a cold night to let a horse stand about in harness.'

"'O, no fear of that. We'll be here punctually to the minute,' says he, and without more words, walks about his business.

"Ye see we had no line nearer than Welbeach in those days, and that was a good five miles off. I had a rattlin' mare then, though, that could cover the distance easy in twenty minutes.

"Well, by ten minutes past ten, the shandry was ready, and just on the minute of the quarter, my young gentleman comes up with his friend and a boy carryin' the portmanteaus. The horse bein' ready, and we three ready too, without more ado they hopped into the trap. Mr. Chabot sat in front with me, and his friend perched himself on the back seat, and off we drove.

"I hadn't much time to look at Mr. Chabot's friend, but he seemed about the same height as the young Frenchman, with a little more beard and mustachios. Mr. Chabot and me, we talked away pretty fast, but the gent behind didn't put in a word; though, for the matter 'o that, it ain't comfortable to talk from the back seat to a party in front. Once Mr. Chabot turned round and said:

"'Have you any cigars there, Philip? I dare say Mr. Clarke would like one; and I'm sure I should.'

"'O yes,' says Mr. Philip, and hands over a case full. I took one, Mr. Chabot took one, and, as I heard Mr. Philip strike a match directly afterward, I concluded he took one too.

"My old mare soon did the distance, and before we had been twenty minutes on the road the red lights of the station came in sight.

"We used to have a practice here then—it's gone out mostly now—o' takin' somethin' short at Easter time, out of the shell of an Easter egg. Mr. Chabot proposed that we should have somethin' short in this way; so I pulled up at a public house opposite the station, for we had ten minutes to spare. Mr. Chabot and I jumped down to go into the public, but Mr. Philip he said he'd go on and get the tickets.

"I says: 'You'd better have a nip out o' the Easter egg, Sir; it's held lucky here to do that; and, any way, it'll warm ye.'

"He wanted a deal o' pressin', but at last he agreed; so we had an Easter egg-shell between us. Mr. Chabot drank first. Then Mr. Philip tried his hand. But, la! I saw he warn't used to neat spirits, he made sich a splutterin', and coughed till I thought he'd ha' choked.

"'Gone the wrong way, Sir,' says I. He looked away, still coughin' and rubbin' his stomach.

"'Burnt—my—inside—nearly to a cinder,' I heard him blurt out to Mr. Chabot. Then he rushed off to get the tickets.

"'Friend ain't partial to a raw nip, Sir," says I. Mr. Chabot laughed, and said:

"'No; that 's a taste he hasn't acquired yet.'

"In a few minutes we heard the train comin'. Mr. Chabot slipped a sovereign into my hand, and thanked me for drivin' him and his friend. I followed him to the platform; the two of 'em jumped into a first-class carriage, and the last I saw of 'em was as the train was movin' off. They both looked out of the window, laughin' and wavin' their hands at me. I waved my hand back to 'em, and then the train went out into the darkness and I lost them.

"The next mornin' there was such a hubbub and to-do over yonder as you never heard. Miss Susie wasn't to be found anywhere,—hadn't slept in her bed all night, and was gone nobody knew where. Ye see, they went to bed so early that they hadn't missed her over night. Well, d'ye know, I was that stupid that I never guessed what had happened, till my Betty she comes up to me and says:

"'You're a nice sort o' feller, Joe! A fine mess you've got yourself into! and you the father of a family, too!'

"'Mess!' says I. 'What d'ye mean?'

"'What do I mean?' says she. 'Why, you ought to be ashamed o' yourself, not to know better than help a young girl like that to run away from her home! He's nigh as big a villain as the man she's run away with.'

"'Will ye believe me, even then I didn't see what she was drivin' at, till she went on, with a face the color o' raw beef:

"'Don't tell me you know nothin' about it—don't stand there and look so innocent. How would they ha' got away if it hadn't been for you drivin them? Ah, get away with ye! it's enough to make an honest woman ashamed of her husband, so it is.'

"Now I saw it all plain enough. Mr. Chabot and his friend!—the drive to the station! It nearly took away my breath as the truth burst upon me. The young gentleman that sat behind had been—Miss Susie Carter! Well, of all the neat tricks ever played, there's none comes up to that,' says I to myself. Then I turns to Betty, and says:

"'I'll take my solemn oath, Betty, I never guessed what was up till this minute. As true as I am standing here, I had no more notion that that young feller with Mr. Chabot was a lady, than I'd have now that you're Queen of England."

It was a long time afore the old 'oman would believe me, but she come round at last; and when old Carter came to hear of it, my word, didn't he swear, and wasn't he mad! Didn't he pitch into me, neither! But I gave him as good as I got; and when he told me I had helped his daughter to escape, I gave him the lie flat. He swore he'd have the law on me. But young Chabot wrote a letter exoneratin' me from all blame, and sayin' I was as innocent as a babe unborn, which was Gospel truth; and the old man came to me afterward, and said he was sorry for the hasty words he had spoken.

"I had a letter from the young scamp, too, thankin' me in the name of himself and his wife (they were married as soon as they got to London) for the kind service I had done them. He said Mr. Philip wished me to know that though he was willing to forgive, he never could forget the agony and torture I had put him to by pressing him into taking that dreadful hot brandy out of the lucky egg-shell, which he was afraid to refuse lest he should rouse suspicion.

"After holdin' out against 'em desperate for six months or more, old Carter came round and gave in, and made the best of it; and it wasn't a bad thing, for young Chabot had money of his own. It was when they came down here, man and wife, to stay with the old man, that they gave me yonder egg you asked about. It's a pretty thing, though I don't know what it's made of; some kind of French plaster, I take it. They said it was a fitting token to recall that memorable night; and more especially Miss Susie—Mrs. Chabot, that is—said, to keep alive the remembrance of that awful egg-shell full o' brandy.

"Well, I was riled a bit, at first, at the trick they had played on me, and at the way they had made me their tool; but I have never regretted doin' them the service. I believe it was a kindness to them, after all; for they loved one another, and they'd only ha' been miserable if they had been separated. And it's my belief, Sir, that if there was a little more of that sort o' love which made them two young folks run away rather than be parted, between a many husbands and wives that gets married in a proper and respectable way, this world 'ud be a sight happier than it is."

LOVE CONTRASTED IN THE TEUTONS AND LATINS.—One of the tests applicable to the measurement of the imaginative faculties of a nation is the mode in which those passions are felt and regarded by the people which belong partly to the material and partly to the spiritual portion of man's nature. It must be clear at once, on a very cursory consideration of the subject, that the great master passion, love, as it is felt by each man and woman among us; as it is regarded by us when spectators of the working of the passion in others; as it is written of and sung of by our writers of fiction and poets; as it is taught and preached of by our divines, is very largely, very intimately concerned with the imaginative side of our natures; more largely and more intimately concerned with that, it is probably not too much to say, than with the more material part of us, with which it is also of course connected. We all of us consider the love of men and women, and the histories which tell of it and of its workings, as a very "romantic" thing. And the meaning of that phrase is no other than that it is a matter strongly moving the imagination. Where is the man of our race who sees the object of his love simply and accurately in all respects as she is, or is so seen by her? If such a one were pointed out to us, should we not at once decide and say that such a man was no true lover? How is the passion of love regarded similarly by the people of any of the nations of the Latin stock? The whole body of their literature, whether ancient or modern, may be appealed to for the answer. Examine the whole sense and bearing of that grand sentiment expressed in those often-quoted lines of LOVELACE:—

I could not love thee, dear, so much,
Loved I not honor more—

Examine the whole meaning of that thought, and consider the part which the imaginative faculties had in the production of it; and then bearing all the love stories we can remember, as told in the pages of old Italian or modern French novelists and poets, let any man say, whether it is at all on the cards that such an expression of sentiment should have been uttered by any one of them!—Saint Pauls.

WHAT WE OWE THE ARABS.—The industrious Arabs revived those useful arts which the barbarians of Europe seemed anxious to forget. They wove the richest fabrics of wool, cotton, or silk; they manufactured cloth of gold and carpets of unequaled splendor; their divans were covered with satin cushions and velvet hangings, and muslins and lace of fairy-like texture adorned the Moslem bride. In metals the Arabs were also excellent workmen. They forged huge chains and bars of iron; the steel of Damascus was renowned in the cities of Europe. Their jewelry was the fairest and costliest of the age; they lavished gold and silver in decorating their mosques and their palaces, and their mints produced a coinage that was the model of the European world. As architects they invented a strangely graceful style of building, in which the fancy of the artist seemed to revel in new creations, and of which the lovely ruins of the Alhambra form a living example; in their private houses they gathered the richest marbles, the costliest mosaics, fountains of dancing waters and gardens of perpetual beauty.

The Arab workman was usually temperate almost to austerity. MOHAMMED had enforced the doctrine of total abstinence with a rigor unsurpassed by the most austere of modern reformers. He denounced temporal and eternal woes against the Mussulman who should touch the accursed wine. He had himself an example of perfect abstinence, and in their purer age his followers obeyed the precept of their prophet. It was only in the decline of the nation that the Mohammedans learned to imitate the drunkenness and license of the Europeans. Temperate in their diet, frugal in their mode of life, the Arabs possessed sound intellects in sound bodies; they soon began to display an intellectual vigor that raised them to the front of civilization. They eagerly sought for knowledge amid the ruins of Grecian literature, and the poets and philosophers of Athens and of Rome were translated for the benefit of the students of Bagdad and Cordova. The colleges and schools of the Arab cities were thronged with attentive scholars when the great nobles of France and England could neither read nor write; they produced eminent poets and graceful writers while Europe had neither a literature nor a language; their libraries numbered thousands of volumes when Oxford possessed only a few imperfect manuscripts chained to the walls; and the poorest merchant of Bagdad lived with more comfort and was far better informed than the proud knight who came at the head of his barbarous squadrons to die on the burning plains of Syria in an ineffectual crusade. Common schools and colleges, indeed, seem to have originated with the Arabs. The caliphs were as ardent friends of popular education as a BROUGHAM or a BARNARD. HAROUN AL RASCHID decreed that a free school should be attached to every mosque; the Spanish caliphs founded colleges at Cordova and Seville that became the models of those of France and England; the Saracenic working men were accomplished artists, and the general education of the people aided the progress of manufactures and the arts.—Harper's Magazine for May.

FLIRTATION.—It takes two to make a flirtation, it must be remembered; and the ordinary practice of society—to blame the girl whenever a flirtation-copartnership is broken up—constantly produces cases of great hardship. Why must it necessarily be the girl that is in the wrong? At present, flirtation is accepted as a fashionable amusement. It is far more interesting than bezique; it is not limited by conditions of time and place, like croquet; and it has just that spice of danger which heightens one's enjoyment of any pastime. When two charming young creatures begin to flirt with each other, don't they know perfectly what they are about? Falling seriously in love is quite another matter, and is known by its very different symptoms. There is a fine, airy, theatrical appearance about a flirtation which the more solemn business of love-making invariably lacks. A true lover fears to mention his mistress' name. He has had less to hide. His secret should be known to herself. He is silent. He is moody, and given to long and vacant staring at the table-cover or carpet. He secretly watches the too-sweet face which has enthralled him; and he has a terrible inward qualm when her eye catches his. He is miserable when he is beside her; he is unutterably wretched when he is away from her. The stars are his confidants; he abhors the faces of men, and turns away in disgust from the smoking-room of his club. But the man who is only carrying on a flirtation is a very different creature. He plays at making love in a well-combed manner which is meant to be amusing. He is great in the matter of compliments; he is easy in manner, jocular, and occasionally (with such brains as Providence has given him) even witty. With him the tragedy of love-making is turned into a clever burlesque, with plenty of light, brilliant dresses, good music and merriment.—"Flirts and Flirtation," in Temple Bar.

ROTTEN ROW.—Although up to this period of the season the people who ride or drive in the Row have not been distracted by any specially sensational ponies under the direction of anonymous ladies, questionable broughams and horse-breakers have even thus early appeared in Hyde Park in excess of the number with which the assemblage is usually enlivened. But it is not so much of this circumstance, however, that we now write. In itself it is bad enough, but it is difficult to see how such people could be kept out of the parks. There is a significance, however, in another social aspect of the matter which is more important. Until very recently there was no such thing as a demi-monde in London, using the term in its imperfect meaning, as understood here. The wretched women went down rapidly from one stage to another without being encouraged or systematized sufficiently to form a regular set—having establishments and holding receptions such as distinguish a corresponding class in Paris. But within a very brief period—not much more than a year, perhaps—there has been a change among us. Previous to that time, indeed, moralists in the Press complained of the frank terms which young men of fashion held with such women in places of public resort. This familiarity is now so much on the increase (as any one who watches what goes on in the Ladies' Mile can perceive,) that it calls for some remonstranee. Formerly Aspasia and her associates were passed with a nod, or only spoken to by men who were indifferent to notice, because they were themselves unknown, or, at any rate, if they recognized such women they were cautious where it was done. At present the yellow-chignoned denizens of St. John's Wood and Pimlico draw up their carriages or horses close to the rails, and are chatted with as candidly as if they had come from some dovecot in the country watched over by a virtuous mother. The audacity of these reunions is unprecedented. A notion seems to prevail that the loose women of our day are undistinguishable from the women of virtue. The superstition is preposterous. In the park, at least, there is no difficulty in distinguishing the carriage that anybody may pay for or in guessing the occupation of the dashing equestrienne who salutes half-a dozen men at once with her whip, or with a wink, and who sometimes varies the monotony of a safe seat by holding her hands behind her back while gracefully swerving over to listen to the compliments of a walking admirer. Of course the men who talk with these women of the highway are perfectly aware of what they are about, and a London lady tempered in the atmosphere of one or two seasons learns discretion enough not to ask relevant questions when she meets in a ball-room the same gentleman she has observed tete-a-tete with Aspasia in the Row. If things go on, however, as they seem likely to, this sort of reserve will be tested with unusual severity in the months of May and June. The manner in which what again, for want of a more convenient phrase, we must call the demi-monde class has been freshly developed among us is not unknown. There are certain perfumers' shops at the West-end notorious for enterprises not immediately connected with bloom for the lips and glitter for the eyes. It was from one of these establishments that a well-known photograph and its original were, so to speak, floated. Here loungers turn in, and are invited to balls, for which cards are given them. Thence spring intimacies of which we say no more than that the acknowledgment of them should be suspended before virtuous women in the Park. The ladies have a remedy in their hands which they deliberately abandon when they pretend blindness to what is as obvious as the Duke's statue at the Corner. And, of course, if they choose to encourage the open and flagrant disrespect to which they are treated there is no help for them.—Pall Mall Gazette.

MAY APPLES.

Hid in the deep, dank hollows of the woods,
Their green escutcheons the May apples raise,
Though through the thick screen of their solitudes
Scarce pierces the sun's blaze;
Perchance to keep from irreligious sight,
Borne on each breast, a star-flower lily white.

Mysterious plants! that nurse a luscious fruit,
That star, transformed by Summer's sultry air;
And in the fibres of the long alim root
A potent medicine bear;
While in each shield, which that pure blossom hides
So carefully, a poisonous death resides.

Beauty and use and noxiousness are here:
Most diverse powers in slender limits lie:
Pleasure that palls, an ill that all men fear,
And joyance for the eye:
And there withal—worthy a wise man's note—
To ill itself a marvelous antidote.

There's wonder in the lowliest plants that grow,
Beauty and grace for all who truly see;
And these I sing the Almighty Artist show
No less than towering tree:
The royal oak that soars above the sod
No more than these does testify of God.

VENETIAN GLASS.

As soon as he had established his mosaic works on a sure foundation, SALVIATI turned his attention to the revival of Venetian blown glass, and in this department has exceeded the expectations of his most sanguine admirers. In the eighteenth century this art was so utterly lost that GUISEPPE BRIATIE, in order to recover some of the secrets, worked as a porter in a glass factory in Bohemia, and on his return obtained from the Republic the exclusive right of manufacture, and a law prohibiting the introduction of any foreign glass into Venice. His manufactory existed until 1790, after which period, if we except a few successful attempts made by DOMENICO BUSSOLIN, the author of a very interesting little pamphlet entitled Les célèbres Verrieres de Venise et de Murano, the art of glass seemed hopelessly lost. As late as June, 1866, Mr. CHAFFERS, in his paper on early Venetian glass, speaks of its chief beauties as things of the past. The methods of manipulating reticulated glass, he tells us, "are yet undiscovered, and all attempts at imitation have been hitherto unsuccessful." He speaks of the rich sapphire color as lost, and gives an engraving of a cup, regarded as quite unique, for which Mr. SLADE paid 6,606f. At the present moment you may set before ANTONIO SEGUSO or ANTONIO and GIOVANNI BAROVIER, any specimen of old Venetian glass, and they will copy it with all imperfections, a nd, if you choose, its imperfections, and hand you a jar simile in color, form and weight, made under your own eye. Both in 1866 and 1868 I spent hours in the workroom of MURANO, fascinated, despite the blinding heat, by the fairy forms and rainbow hues evolved before my eyes; by the intense, grave, silent enthusiasm of the workmen, which extends itself even to the small children admitted to watch the proceedings; by the impossibility of quitting the scene of labor until the piece in hand could be secured from failure by completion.

On my visit, the head workman was requested by SALVIATI to make me any article I might fancy; I chose a wine-glass with deep bowl, initial stem, and broad, ruby-tinted foot. The man dipped his hollow iron rod into a pot of molten white glass, caught up a lump, rolled it on an iron slab, popped it into the furnace, blew through his rod, tossed it aloft, and a hollow ball appeared. His assistant handed him a rod of metal, in which a green serpent seemed coiled in a white cage; this he caught, and, quick as lightning, formed two initials, touching the bowl with the tip of the M, to which it adhered. Then his assistant offered more white glass, which was joined to the bottom of the M, spun round, opened with nippers, and so the foot was formed. Again into the furnace, and then the shears opeand and hollowed the deep and slender bowl. Then the assistant handed a scrap of ruby molten glass, of which the master caught a hair as it were, wound it round the rim of the bowl, and of the foot. Once more into an upper oven, where it must remain till the furrow is cool, and then I drew a long breath of relief; for,—knowing that if the metal be too hot or too cold, if too much or too little be taken on the rod, the weight and color will be faulty; that too quick or too slow an action on the part of the assistant, in presenting or withdrawing his rod, may spoil the whole,—one cannot watch such processes without intense excitement. This excitement the workmen share in their own silent fashion; and when any rare experiment is going on, all gather round the master in breathless anxiety, while no sound comes from the parted lips save that of the form of a hint or caution. During my last visit the question was, how to remedy a defect in an exquisite antique ewer, of white and sapphire, lent by the Brescian Museum to be copied. The scroll handle, in the original, had a pinch, and the pinch was renewed in the copy. The workman said that it was necessarily produced by the assistant's shears in handing the scroll to be fixed. "Let him hold it higher," said one. "Then I shall fix the handle awry." And this was the result. He tried again, and this time the proper curve was not attained. Once more, and by a dexterous movement he caught the scroll in his fingers, and fixed it in the right place, producing the sapphire ewer exactly, minus only the defective pinch.

But these men by no means restrict their efforts to servile copies. SALVIATI used to allow them two hours for original attempts; and ZANNETTI, a sort of superintendent, now that the heat of the furnace is too much for his eyes, is most fertile in producing new designs. The immense lampadaro—one of five ordered by Prince GIOVANELLI, to adorn the ball-room of his palace—is a sort of coöperative design. It is of white glass; the candlesticks, ruby tinted, seemingly hung by frail, transparent links of purest glass; pinks and tulips, with their spiked upright leaves, blossom between the tiers; while—and this is the innovation—garlands of leaves and flowers, such as are now blossoming in the early Spring, are hung beneath the bosses, which are generally ugly and forlorn. The hanging lampadaro is by far the largest ever blown, and is composed of innumerable different pieces; so that if any get broken they can be at once replaced. SALVIATI imagined the garlands, ZANNETTI designed the chandelier, BAROVIER grew the field flowers and SEGUSO wrought the parts. Such is the perfection to which this master has attained, that he will turn out any given number of pieces of precisely the same size, form and weight. This perfect obedience of the hand to the eye is the ne plus ultra of the artist in glass. In the same room with their fathers are two young lads who work together, one week as master, the next as assistant. I watched them as they stood at the furnace mouth—one sedate, stern, intent as his father; the other, the master of the week, bright-eyed, restless, but the deftest little imp imaginable. Beakers of nebulous opal, ewers, vases and urns spun from his fairy rod; but, as his father pointed out, he could make no two things alike, neither could he yet manage to "marry" the colors.—Cornhill Magazine.

AMELIA OPIE'S LATER YEARS.—She suddenly discovered that all is vanity: she took to gray silks and muslin, and the "thee" and "thou," quoted Habakkuk and Micah with gusto, and set her heart upon preaching. That, however, was not allowed. Her Quaker friends could never be sufficiently sure how much was "imagination," and how much the instigation of "the inward witness;" and the privileged gallery in the chapel was closed against her, and her utterance was confined to loud sighs in the body of the Meeting. She tended her father unremittingly in his decline; she improved greatly in balance of mind and evenness of spirits during her long and close intimacy with the GURNEYS; and there never was any doubt about her beneficent disposition, shown by her family devotedness, no less than by her bounty to the poor. Her majestic form moved through the narrowest streets of the ancient city, and her bright face was seen lighting up the most wretched abodes. The face never lost its brightness, nor the heart its youthfulness and gayety. She was a merry laugher in her old age; and even, if the truth be spoken, still a bit of a romp—ready for bo-peep and hide-and-seek, in the midst of a morning call, or at the end of a grave conversation. She enjoyed showing prim young Quaker girls her ornaments, plumes and satins, and telling them when she wore them; and, when in Paris, she ingenuously exhibited in her letters to her Quaker friends the conflict in her feelings when LOUIS PHILLIPPE, attended by his staff, stopped to converse with her in the streets of Paris, and when the Queen of the French requested her to appoint an evening for a party at the Tuileries. She made a pleasant joke of the staring of the Parisians at her little gray bonnet; and sighed and prayed that she might not be puffed up by all the rest. She was not really spoilable, and her later years were full of grace and kindliness.—Harriet Martineau's Sketches.

NAPOLEON THE GREAT.—The conception which M. LANFREY has formed of NAPOLEON'S character is an intelligible one enough. Selfishness, developed to its highest point in a nature of exceptional energy, would, if we judge rightly, be described by the author as the predominant characteristic of the man. Attached to his family as constituents of his greatness, fond of his soldiers as the instruments of his ambition, loving France as the scene of his glory, he was yet ready at any moment to sacrifice family, army, and country to the advancement of his own interests or the gratification of his vanity. Constitutionally humane, he would sacrifice the lives of thousands on the battle-field without the slightest compunction, and would sanction the perpetration of a murder—like that of the Duke D'ENGHIEN—for no other reason than an impression that a show of vigor would strengthen his position. But analysis of character is not a pursuit for which M. LANFREY seems to us to have any special fancy. He describes the acts of the hero of his narrative, and leaves the reader to draw his own conclusions as to the motives which led to these actions. He takes, indeed, an almost morbid delight in showing how the indifference to convictions of every kind, the freedom from prejudices, the absence of moral considerations, which constituted NAPOLEON'S strength, constituted his weakness also, and led to his ultimate downfall. Without principle himself, he could never credit the existence of it in others; indifferent to truth or justice, he could never realize the influence that these qualities exert over mankind; devoid of the instinct of patriotism, he always overlooked its operation as an element of human affairs. So it came to pass that time after time he committed blunders and involved himself in difficulties which men with not one-tenth part of his ability, but with a truer appreciation of humanity, would have avoided. Indeed, the chief moral M. LANFREY has to teach is, that the world has given NAPOLEON I. credit for a clearness of vision and a grasp of mind which he was far from possessing. The expedition to Egypt, the proposed invasion of England, the naval campaign which terminated in Trafalgar, the conquest of Prussia, were all, as the narrator endeavors to show, gigantic follies due to an overweening vanity, and redeemed only from the disaster which ought to have followed them, partly by luck still more by the errors of NAPOLEON'S opponents. In fact, if this view is correct, the march to Moscow is only the logical termination of the imperial career. "When you think"—to quote the author's words—"of the marvellous instrument which he wielded in his hands, and of the unworthy use to which so long a time he applied it with impunity, your imagination carries you back to those magic powers who play so important a part in Oriental tales. So long as the hero retains the talisman everything prospers with him beyond the bounds of possibility. The principles which govern other men have for him no existence. Unheard of prodigies arise without effort under his unconscious hands. He knows neither good nor evil; he laughs at impossibilities. He mocks, at his pleasure, at all that is just and sacred. From him madness becomes genius; imprudence, skill; iniquity, justice; and the more he tramples under foot all rules of wisdom, right, and common sense, the more his success swells and grows and fills the world. The very laws of nature seem to be upset; mankind contemplates with superstitious terror the sinister glory of the meteor. They are ready to defy this privilegde, invulnerable mortal, whose astounding fortune can be compromised by no crime, weakened by no folly. One day the talisman is broken or lost, and of a sudden the god disappears. There is nothing left but a wretched lunatic; you ask whether this elect of destiny has not been its victim, and your mind hesitates in perplexity between horror and pity. Such is the history of NAPOLEON?"—St. Paul's.

HOW WALTER SCOTT WROTE.—In the Waverley Novels, then appearing in that marvelously rapid succession which astonished the world, there was an ample reservoir of wealth, if it had been wisely secured, as well as of fame. But an alarming interruption was threatened by the illness of the novelist. His malady—cramp of the stomach, with jaundice—was attended with exquisite pain; but in the intervals of comparative ease his literary labors were continued; and it certainly is an extraordinary fact in literary history that under such circumstances the greater part of the Bride of Lammermoor, the whole of the Legend of Montrose, and almost the whole of Ivanhoe were produced. The novelist lay on a sofa, dictating to JOHN BALLANTYNE or to LAIDLAW, chiefly to the latter, as he was always at hand, whereas BALLANTYNE was only an occasional visitor at Abbotsford. Sometimes in his most humorous or elevated scenes, SCOTT would break off with a groan of torture, as the cramp seized him, but when the visitation had passed, he was ever ready gayly to take up the broken thread of his narrative and proceed currente calamo. It was evident to LAIDLAW that before he arrived at Abbotsford (generally about 10 o'clock) the novelist had arranged his scenes for the day, and settled in his mind the course of the narrative. The language was left to the inspiration of the moment; there was no picking of words, no studied curiosa felicitas of expression. Even the imagery seemed spontaneous. LAIDLAW abjured with some warmth the old-wife exclamations which LOCKHART ascribes to him—as "Gude keep us a'"—"the like o' that!"—"eh, sirs! eh, sirs!" But he admitted that while he held the pen he was at times so deeply interested in the scene or in the development of the plot, that he could not help exclaiming, "Get on, Mr. SCOTT, get on!" on which the novelist would reply, smiling, "Softly, WILLIE; you know I have to make the story," or some good-humored remark of a similar purport. It was quite true, he said, that when dictating some of the animated scenes and dialogues in Ivanhoe, SCOTT would rise from his seat and act the scene with every suitable accompaniment of action, gesture and manner. Both the military and dramatic spirit were strong in him,—too strong even for the cramp and calomel! The postscript to a short business letter from Edinburgh, June 14, 1819, refers to this business of dictation. "Put your fingers in order, and buy yourself pens,—I won't stand to the expense of your quills, so pluck the goose 'a God's name!" And it was plucked on this occasion to record the sorrows of the Bride of Lammermoor.—Gentleman's Magazine.

A FREAK OF BROUGHAM.—It would appear that at the same time he partook of theatrical amusements, and that he acquired some reputation as a critic in the dramatic art. The following anecdote is in the words of Professor PILLANS, a distinguished classical scholar, who was born the same year with BROUGHAM, was in the same class with him at the High School, was for some years head master of that school, and now worthily fills the Humanity Chair in the University of Edinburgh, having been a public teacher above forty-six years. By way of explanation I must state what Professor PILLANS reminded me of, and what I myself perfectly well recollect, that in the end of the last and the beginning of the present century, whenever there was a dinner party, after the ladies had withdrawn, the gentlemen continued giving toasts at every round of the bottle, till at last the toast of "Good afternoon" was given, upon which the party broke up and left the room: "While we were under FRASER together a new play was to be brought out at the Edinburgh Theatre, written by ROBERT HERRON, a very foolish fellow. It was called, I think, 'The Jolly Topper.' I went by myself to the shilling gallery, where I met very good company. I hope you know that we modern Athenians consider that we have a very delicate taste in the drama, but are very tolerant to a new piece till we can fully judge of its merits, and then we are very decisive. This piece was exceedingly absurd and dreadfully dull, though intended to be witty. The first four acts were heard out, though with a few groans and hisses. When the curtain drew up for the fifth act, the stage was occupied by a large party at table, with bottles and glasses before them. The gentleman in the chair then flourishing his glass said. 'All charged! Give us a toast!' when a tall stripling in the pit stood up and exclaimed, 'I humbly propose Good Afternoon.' He then made for the door, waving his hat for the rest of the audience to follow him; and the cry of 'Good Afternoon' being repeated by the boxes, pit and galleries, there was a general dispersion, and the piece was damned. This stripling was HENRY BROUGHAM, the future Lord Chancellor."—Lives of Lord Lyndhurst and Lord Brougham, by the late Lord John Campbell.

PARTING.

We clasp our hands: we turn and go,
Our footsteps echoing years between;
We meet again: we hardly know
These ghosts of loved ones long unseen.

We clasp our hands: we turn and go,
Far travelers with strange hours and years;
The face, the form, the voice we know,
They come not back from time and tears.

We clasp our hands in loving trust;
We send our voices o'er the wave:
No hand can reach us—from the dust;
No voice can find us—in the grave.

HOW WEBSTER AND CLAY SAT FOR THEIR PICTURES.—Mr. WEBSTER sat for his picture in the year 1849, in the art-gallery corner of Fulton-street and Broadway, opposite St. Paul's Church. He was the guest at the time of the Astor House, in which establishment he was by the proprietors treated with the most princely consideration. He received the request to sit for his picture, after being informed it would only occupy a few moments of his time, with a prompt assent, and made no other remarks than were necessary to fix the time and place. Punctually to the moment, and unattended, he was at the gallery. He was expected, and when he made his appearance his dignified presence, massive head, his large dark eye, and commanding political position almost paralyzed the then comparatively inexperienced workmen. His style of dress was also calculated to attract attention, the prominent object of which was a blue dress-coat ornamented with richly-gilt buttons. Under direction he quietly took his seat, and was as kindly disposed as a well-trained child. It was more difficult in those days than now to take a picture, but Mr. WEBSTER submitted with as a

HOW THEY LIVE IN HEAVEN.

A Look Into the "Gates Wide Open"—Scenes in Another World—A Singular Book—An Oratorio in Heaven—"Gates Ajar" and its Author—Books in Press.

From Our Regular Correspondent.

BOSTON, Tuesday, April 27, 1869.

The Gates Wide Open, which LEE & SHEPARD announce for publication early in May, will doubtless create full as much of a stir in what are termed religious circles, and in the world of readers, as Miss PHELPS' Gates Ajar has caused. It is not an entirely new book, for it was published in 1858 by DERBY & JACKSON, but it had only a trifling circulation, as its publishers very soon after failed and returned the plates to the author. Mr. GEORGE WOOD, who is well known in literature as the author of Peter Schlemiel in America. This fact, that the book is not an entirely new thing, the author frankly states in his preface, and also says that reading Gates Ajar suggested its republication and its present title. The book purports to be a relation of the experiences of two persons in another world, which they have reached through death, and to give minute representations of the world to come. These persons are Mrs. JOHN JAY, who had been the wife of an eminent citizen of New-York, &c., and Mr. PETER SCHLEMIHL. PETER, it seems, died last in this world, but only a short time after Mrs. JAY, and the two met in one of the worlds above, recognized each other, told each other the particulars of their death, and what had befallen them since then and previous to their meeting, and then traveled together through the worlds of the heavens. PETER tells Mrs. JAY that at his death he was taken by his guardian angel up into the heavens, and past suns and stars that flew by him with the rapidity of meteors, to the Holy City and into the presence of the Great Redeemer. And then he was sent, under the conduct of his guardian, to the world in which he then was with Mrs. JAY to begin his studies. While in the Holy City he had been disappointed in seeing no Scripture personages, and was told by his angel, when he asked where Paul was, that he and the others had long since been made meet for the high service of messengers of the Grace of God, and were now telling the tidings of the redemption of a lost race by the sufferings and the death of Christ. This, he was told, was the last attainment of a glorified soul. And PETER further says:

"Gladly did I take my angel into the development of my soul's energies, and yet I was surprised to find myself, though disembodied, and after so great a change, so little changed. And this thought was present to me when I felt in my soul the consciousness of power to wing my flight to the very verge of creation, if such there be. But it was not long before I found myself, as on earth, a child of limited powers and in the infancy of my being. I had everything to learn, and could not reach my beginnings any more than an infant who cries for the moon. But then I was docile, and made the glad discovery that I had now none of the repinings of earth clinging to me."

The world in which the two were was one of the worlds of Beauty and Art, "of which there is an inconceivable number;" and they were conversing "where a beautiful little Doric edifice stood on a shaft of granite, which rose out of the centre of a lake, the shores of which lay about a mile distant. These were covered with villas whose velvety-green ornamental grounds ran down to the water. In front of them, and standing upon a bold, rocky bank, rose a magnificent temple, whose golden spires and lofty dome were reflected in long lines of light upon the glassy surface of the lake with all the gorgeous clouds of a Summer's eve, lit up by the great setting flame." While they were sitting here they heard distant songs from a multitude of voices coming from the temple, and then saw the multitude of angel worshippers thronging out and retiring in family groups to their villas. Last of all came a bevy of youth of both sexes "wearing the halo of the redeemed," who were crowding playfully around two mature persons who seemed to promote the amusement of these happy beings. These two mature persons, Mrs. JAY and PETER, recognized as their old friends of earth, Deacon and Mrs. COLGATE. They had a joyful meeting and were introduced to the young folks. There the deacon told them all died in childhood or infancy and were sent to him to be trained into the science of music. The two travelers were invited to spend the night with the deacon and his wife in their house—the magnificent Palace of the Redeemer, which was beautiful beyond description in its adornments and filled with perfect works of art. When supper was announced they were led into a spacious saloon, where they found a hundred or more youth assembled, and the table covered with gold of exquisite workmanship, and vases filled with fruits and flowers; grapes just gathered, and fruits of various hues before unseen. The Gloria having been sung they seated themselves. The company were all arrayed in "robes of light," and wore the "halo of immortality," and ate their meal of fruits with playfulness and joy. PETER was entertained by a beautiful Egyptian girl, and after supper took a walk with her. But it is impossible to point out a sixtieth part of the strange things of this book within the limits of a single letter. However, a few more may be noted. The deacon tells the two strangers all about the wondrous things of heaven, and among other statements makes this:

"The germ of population commenced here as on earth, only as their Adam and Eve ate no apple, so their Paradise covers the entire globe. There are here two classes—the commoners, who are many, and the select few, who are born as in England, lords of the soil. These all have their appropriate training in their several schools of literature, art and science, and when they attain to perfection here, they are translated to a higher sphere where they are placed in worlds analogous, but of greater glory, and thus they go onward to endless progression."

In these worlds they have the telegraph and all the improvements of man introduced on earth, and claim that they have found something to supersede steam—a process of liberating the inconceivable power of electricity latent in water. And they speak, in the world in which our travelers are, the English language with great beauty—a point that will be of interest to Mr. RICHARD GRANT WHITE, no doubt, and give him a longing to mingle with its people.

AN ORATORIO IN HEAVEN.

During their travels Mrs. JAY and PETER were taken to the "Metropolitan City" to hear a new oratorio, the joint production of HANDEL, HAYDN, MOZART and BEETHOVEN, all of whom were to aid in its performance. The city, we are told, covers an immense plateau of highlands, surrounded by snow-capped mountains, and has in its very centre a glassy lake fed by rivulets from the mountains. They alighted on the tesselated pavement of a grand square, on either side of which were sculptured fountains. Slender obelisks rose to a great height in front of a majestic temple, which filled up one side of the square. This they were told was in the form of the Greek Cross, and was a reproduction of St. Peter's by MICHAEL ANGELO, who was made happy on his arrival in the new world by receiving the appointment of architect. In this temple the oratorio was to be given. A multitude of angel citizens, with their families, were thronging the entrances. Every face was bright with anticipation, and their steps were eager and elastic; but—and mark this, O New-York—there was no vulgar hurry, no jostling, but the utmost courtesy prevailed. Well, they went in, saw new wonders, took their seats, and prepared themselves to see and listen:

"HANDEL, HAYDN, MOZART and BEETHOVEN now had taken their several stations when the organist began playing the grand overture. As the overture proceeded the audience slid into the thema, and gradually the intensity of high and holy thoughts conveyed by the soul-entrancing harmony so thrilled the audience that they rose as by one impulse when the choir burst into the anthem, 'Holy, holy, holy art thou Lord God Almighty; the earth is full of Thy glory.' These words were reduplicated in multiform ways, and with every new modification new impressions of the stupendous thoughts arose in the soul of every auditor, until it seemed beyond the power of even angelic natures to endure such harmony as this. This anthem sunk away in far off echoes, as if distant worlds had caught the flame of enthusiasm, and the rebound came back in murmurs, till all was hushed. Then the silence of night on the plains of Bethlehem was painted to the mind's eye through the ear. The bleating of the lambs and the buzzing of the insects of a Summer's night were distinctly heard, and the dull tinkling and pastoral voices of night were so closely imitated that the imagination was captivated by the soothing sounds. Then a new movement showed the souls of the shepherds full of lofty aspirations as they gazed upon the stars burning above them; and in recitatives they spoke to each other of the promises made in the holy oracles of God, of the Messiah that was to come. Then suddenly blazed forth the glory of God from out the dark heavens, and the words of the angel were sung, 'Fear not: for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord.' Then came the glorious chorus, 'Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men.'"

The assembly was a long time dispersing, there were so many words to be spoken in admiration of the new oratorio and of the glorious theme; and so Mrs. JAY and PETER had a good opportunity to look about them more, and

"they were charmed with the childlike innocency in the face of MOZART; as for BEETHOVEN, he had not yet descended from his open vision of the throne of God, and sat gazing upward as in a trance. HAYDN with smiles received the congratulations of the choir gathering about him, while HANDEL, in a rapt state of soul, stood looking up to the frescoed roof, as if those angels ever bright and fair, floating in the heavens above, were answering back his beautiful appeal to take him in their arms."

Further on in the book Mrs. JAY describes her meeting with Satan; sings some airs native to good society in New-York; is introduced to DANTE and BEATRICE; listens to a sermon preached by JOHN HOWE, once Chaplain to OLIVER CROMWELL; and is recalled to earth by FLAVIANUS, her angel, to be present at the marriage of her daughter.

GATES AJAR AND ITS AUTHOR.

By many Miss PHELPS is called an infidel, and the proof of her infidelity is claimed to be in her Gates Ajar. In some of the Cornhill and other religious book stores—or stores for the sale of religious works—her book is not to be seen on the counters with the other new books of the day, and if asked for by some inquiring customer, is only reluctantly shown or obtained. And in one store at least, that of the American Tract Society, I believe, its sale is positively prohibited, and he who should ask for it would doubtless be regarded as fully as dangerous a person as some think the gentle author herself. Miss PHELPS is the daughter of Professor PHELPS, and an accomplished lady. Her mother wrote the "Sunnyside Series" of juveniles, which included A Peep at Number Five, and several other well-known stories, and which were so exceedingly popular a few years ago that a hundred thousand copies or thereabouts of each were sold. Miss PHELPS has written several stories in the Atlantic, and has in each shown some of her peculiar ideas and her original way of thinking, and at the same time her ability and power as a writer. She began, I believe, in juveniles. And the enterprising publisher of her first four, which were brought out some time ago and until recently were pretty much forgotten, has now freshened them up and issued them in new style as "Children's books, by the author of Gates Ajar," and on the strength of the present popularity of their author is doing a good thing for himself. Gates Ajar is having an extraordinary sale, and "they say," who ought to know, that both author and publisher will be marvelously enriched thereby, the latter making a dizzy figure given at random between the $15,000 and $20,000 points. At the rate the book is going now Miss PHELPS can well afford to be called hard names, and may become by and by quite a thrifty and enviable martyr to her beliefs.

SOME BOOKS IN PRESS.

A number of LEIGH HUNT's stray papers have been gathered together by that busy literary collector who seems satisfied to be known only as "Tom Folio," and will be published early in May, by ROBERTS BROTHERS, under the title of A Day by the Fire, and Other Papers. JOHN NEAL'S Wandering Recollections of a Somewhat Busy Life, which will also be forthcoming from the press of the Messrs. ROBERTS in early May, is a quietly told sort of an autobiography, as its name indicates, and contains many reminiscences of the literary people and the literature of the past fifty years or so, with which he has come in contact from time to time. Some of his recollections have been published in Blackwood's and the Atlantic, and his early novels have been extensively read. F. C. BURNAND has made such a happy hit with his Happy Thoughts that his American publishers have determined to bring out, as a companion handy volume, his Out of Town, and it is now in press. And they also, I understand, intend to publish before long a third volume by this thinker of happy thoughts, called The Conversations of Major Blake, which is now coming out in the Britannia. ## ILLINOIS.

Governor Palmer's Vetoes and Illinois Legislation—Storms and Tornadoes—Ten Direct from China—Chicago River Tunnel—Ole Bull's Concert—Union College Alumni Association.

CHICAGO, Saturday, April 24, 1869.

The Legislature of this State, recently adjourned, has signalized itself, if the representations of the ablest and most influential journals here are to be regarded as authority, as more corrupt than any that has gone before it. Though strongly Republican, and hence presumptively in accord with its Republican Governor, the differences between them have been such that veto after veto has been interposed by Governor PALMER to check what he regarded as reckless, if not ruinous legislation. President JOHNSON himself hardly stands more conspicuously before the nation as the veto President par excellence, than Governor PALMER before his State as the veto Governor. Nor were bills passed more summarily over the veto of the former by Congress, than have been sundry of those passed by the Illinois Legislature over the veto of the latter. In the former case, stern hostility between the parties made the result natural and not strange. In the latter, political and party unity of Legislature and Governor makes the variance spoken of little less than marvelous. The solution is, individual corruption of the law-makers; votes bought and sold wherewith to achieve a selfish end; the influence of wealth, whether of individuals or corporations, unscrupulously used to debauch the moral sense and pervert the conscientious judgment. In an editorial in the NEW-YORK TIMES of April 20, it is said forcibly and without mincing matters, that "the government of our great cities has become a by-word of reproach and just contempt. Our State Legislatures are equally bad; there are not half a dozen in the whole Union which are not notoriously open to the basest and most degrading influences by which human action can be controlled. And Congress is rapidly falling into the same false and fatal course." Among the half a dozen Legislatures or less supposed to form exceptions to the charges thus preferred, that of Illinois is certainly not to be reckoned. It stands boldly if not boastingly on the platform of the majority of its sister bodies. "In the annals of legislation in this State," says the Chicago Tribune, "there are many instances of the shameless dishonesty of individual members, and occasionally of willful violation of Constitution, law and justice by political majorities; but we doubt whether any previous body has exhibited such unblushing disregard of all the requirements of common decency as the Legislature now in session." Among the bills passed over the Governor's veto was one selling to the Illinois Central and Michigan Central Railroads, a tract of land running from Dearborn to Monroe-street, and lying on Lake Michigan, in front of the city, and closely adjoining its business centre. The price for which the railroads get it is $800,000, with a trifling per cent. to the city of the revenue to be derived from it. The land is capable of being indefinitely extended by filling out into the lake, and worth now $2,000,000 or $3,000,000, will be worth at no distant day three or four times this sum. To procure such a franchise and property corporations could well afford to pay munificently. The result in this case is but another warning of the danger that is threatening the country from the supremacy of these gigantic and unscrupulous corporations. If the people, the source of power, heed these monitions in time, and not only raise the alarm, but stretch forth their strong arms to strike down the corrupted and the corrupters none the less, all will be well. If they continue supine and listless under these accumulating evils, imposing no restraints upon their servants, and returning to their legislative halls men even whose garments reek with the soil of gold gained through unworthy compliances, it is easy to foresee that the day is not far off when this great Republic will be numbered with those which corruption has overthrown.

A THUNDER-STORM.

A thunder-storm of unusual violence, the first of the season, visited the city on Sunday last. It continued, with slight interruptions, from 4 o'clock in the afternoon till midnight, the clouds pouring out floods of water, and the wind for a good deal of the time treating us to what, in other localities, would be called a gale. Here a moderate gale is little more than an ordinary wind—the former being in certain seasons the normal condition of things. In other sections of the State, and in Indiana, the storm amounted to a tornado. At Indianapolis the large railroad depot was leveled, the watchman of the building being killed; and Rev. D. BALLOU, a Universalist minister, passing along and seeking shelter in an angle of the building, was injured so seriously that his recovery was for a time considered doubtful. Other serious damage was done to the city, and to various places in the circumjacent region. Chicago, from its position, is considered exempt from tornadoes, the high bleak winds prevailing here so extensively being, truth to say, quite infliction enough. If we have had storms and tornadoes, you have had at the East torrents and floods, the damage done by the latter being far in excess of what has been suffered here. Indeed, while the thunder has purified, the genial rains have cheered the earth and made it smile with vegetation. A week has changed everything, and green grass and buds, blossoms and birds, have shown themselves, and the jocund Spring has come to us at a bound.

TEA DIRECT FROM CHINA.

What think you of tea straight from China, via California and Union Pacific Road, arriving here a few days ago!—and not going to New-York or Boston first, as had been the orthodox mode of transportation in the former antiquated times. The fact was duly heralded as Democratic victories are wont to be, by the burning of powder and detonation of cannon, the said cannon being exploded for several hours continuously, not by the Common Council, be it understood, but by the enterprising and jubilant individual to whom the consignment of the said tea was made. In doces, thou tea-chest, might have been punningly and appropriately written on the first box of the article yielding the beverage that "cheers but not inebriates," for its teaching is specially significant in the present case to all Chicagoans—as well as the rest of mankind. It speaks of the marvels wrought by art, enterprise and capital in shortening the vast distances hitherto separating the Old World from the New, and how the success of performing this wondrous work is to influence for all coming ages the destinies of both.

A NEW TUNNEL.

The new tunnel under the south branch of the Chicago River, on Washington-street, though completed last Fall, has only lately been in a condition to be traversed freely by teams and foot passengers. It is about 1,200 feet from side to side, the grade being so gentle, and the numerous gas-burners making it so light, that the pedestrian is rather tempted to enter than repelled. It leaked rather freely for comfort in the early part of Spring, but the sediment from the river settling over the arch, or the growing compactness of the work from pressure, seems to be gradually checking the ooze, which bids fair to cease by and by altogether. It promises to be a complete success. The relief it will afford to masses constantly arrested in passing from side to side by the opening of the bridges to let vessels pass, must be immense. The success of this tunnel will insure the construction of others. At the last meeting of the Common Council, indeed, order was taken to have plans submitted for the building of a tunnel across La Salle-street, another great thoroughfare. And there is little reason to doubt that before very long, tunnels will be constructed under the river to the principal crossings of the city.

OLE BULL'S CONCERT.

OLE BULL gave a concert in Farwell Hall on Wednesday evening last, assisted by Miss S. W. BARTON and Mr. W. MACDONALD. It is eleven or or twelve years since I heard him last, and time is beginning to write its ineffaceable marks upon him. But he is straight still as one of his own Norwegian pines, and, at sixty, has all the delicacy of touch, the boldness, the vigor and vivacity of execution of thirty years ago. With his white neck-cloth and black clothes, and grave, mild, fatherly face, he looks—fiddle-bow to the contrary, notwithstanding—the picture of some old Presbyterian divine. The house was full without being crowded, and his reception cordial and cheering, without being enthusiastic. Each of the three pieces he performed was encored—a compliment, however, which he shared with his two associates similarly distinguished, it being a noticable trait of the good-natured audiences here to pay the like tribute to all candidates for their favor who please them moderately well. OLE BULL is to appear once more at a complimentary benefit given on Monday next to Miss B. SCOTT, and this is announced as his last appearance in Chicago.

A COLLEGE BANQUET.

The Association of the Alumni of Union College residing in the Northwest, organized in March last, have a banquet at the Sherman House on Tuesday, the 27th inst. A similar meeting will be held in Albany on the same day of those residing in that region. Invitations have been sent to all hereabouts whose residences could be ascertained by the Committee of Arrangements, consisting of H. R. Pierson, W. H. King, James Demarest, Clinton Locke and B. F. Culver. About forty graduates of the College reside in this city, and a large number are scattered over this and the surrounding States. The reunion, to those concerned, promises to be highly interesting. C. V. S.

STATE WEDDING IN EGYPT.

The Marriage of a Pacha's Daughter—Interesting Ceremonies and Customs.

Cairo (April 2) Correspondence of the London Daily News.

The Viceroy's eldest daughter has just been married according to the Mohammedan customs, and yesterday (April 1) she was driven away in state from the palace of her grandmother to that of MANSOUR PASHA, the bridegroom. The pre-nuptial festivities lasted for three days and three nights. At daybreak on Monday interminable peals of cannon on high from the citadel hill, and afar from the plain below, awoke a vast assemblage of Cairines and visitors from the large towns and villages of the far-reaching Viceroyalty. Presently bugles, fifes and kettle-drums announced infantry and cavalry parading through the streets. Mounted carabiniers and men of the line strode in the direction of Kasr-Aali, that great block of buildings overlooking the River Nile. The lofty palace walls and the great plain adjoining were surrounded by gaily bestreaked wooden lattice work, swarming like bees in a hive, with tin and stained-glass lanterns, each with its dip ready to be lighted when the sun would go down. Banners, flags and streamers of all shades soared on high and fluttered to the cooling wind. Soldiery and constabulary, on guard at first, soon straggled onward with a jostling but well-behaved holiday-clad population, eager to witness the grand national sights and pastimes on all sides of the vast area, quickly used by many-colored tents, with gilt-legged damask furniture, brought hither from palaces and Government offices, empty and abandoned during the three days' feasting. But the Government clerks are not lazy. They are arranging the tents for the grand banquets to be given. There was to be indiscriminately feeding for the rich and the poor. And so there was. Invitations had been issued for three grand consecutive banquets to Europeans each evening at about 7 o'clock, while whole herds of cattle and flocks of sheep, and plantations of rice, and shiploads of macaroni were all day and night offered to a less pretentious crowd of natives. They filled themselves to their hearts' content, and then squatted on the dusty earth, round trellised booths, from which peeped at times, or emerged altogether, when summoned by some great man to tent or plain, singing girls reciting their plaintive melodies, deserving, no doubt, of the interest they inspired. And dancing girls bedecked in "purple and gold" sallied forth from their headquarters in the day, and after dinner in the evening, for the delectation of the Europeans. It was a vast arena, characteristic of the colossal wealth and unbounded munificence of ISMAIL PASHA, offering a never-ending study of the native element and its pursuits. Here, a dense crowd surrounding an inclosure for jerced throwing horsemen. There, another equally motley and picturesque throng, watching athletes lifting ponderous weights. Presently leger-demain Greeks, perched on gigantic seesaws, throwing ivory balls in rapid indefatigable sequence. Higher still, men on tight ropes balancing weights again, on end of poles. Below all this, hemmed in by the admiring multitude, men dressed as coryphees, wriggling about like the Arab dancing girls to the sound of the native music, which has no particular tune or time. Then came native jugglers holding writhing serpents by the tails, or spurring on monkeys to an attack; exasperating a goat until, poor animal, it butted at a monkey. Then there was a little modest gambling—natives staking their diminutive silver currency, or copper coin, tantamount to half-pence or pennies, on cards, as in England at race meetings. Presently a balloon was dispatched, and then all eyes were riveted on it, as, soaring higher and higher, the astounded natives below thought it would never return with its inmates, but enter the heavenly realms of MOHAMMED at once instead. Moreover, a circus had taken root among the diversified shows and exhibitions performing there in the day, and throughout the night in the palace across the way. There in the harem sat its ladies in state, glorious to behold in their gay silk attire and profusion—without parallel—of priceless stones, glittering in happy harmony with the gold-dust bestrewn double-piled carpets, gilt-legged tables and furniture, gigantic mirrors and chandeliers. Toys from the Black Forest and Nuremberg, music-boxes, talking-dolls, polichinelles in gay attire, cats and kittens, and other animals lined the walls, and caused merriment during the Princess' matinee musicale, varied occasionally by a troupe of native singing girls. Ladies on visits of congratulation arrived during the morning. Her Highness gave three grand banquets to the principal European ladies of Egypt on the evenings of Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday. The after dinner proceedings appear to have been very attractive. Beside the circus the ladies had theatricals. The troupe had been ordered to the Selamek of the Harem, when the native princesses and their European guests watched from their trellis-work galleries the performances below. From their windows they saw the splendid display of fire-works on the adjacent plain. Catherine wheels, "plein air," many-colored rockets appeared for ever in the air, and the gay scene was quickened by different colored Bengal lights. After dining in one of the tents with a great many other favored guests, and listening afterward to the military bands at their posts in the illuminated galleries which covered the palace, it was suggested to the bridegroom. Past the brilliant illuminations, and then through narrow streets, dark as pitch—the moon had not yet risen—we drove, until a fresh blaze of petroleum lamps and carriages obstructing the thoroughfare notified an approach to MANSOUR PASHA'S palace. The eyes were fairly dazzled as they beheld the spacious court-yard draped with rich colored silks, cashmeres and variegated cloths, like an awning on board some leviathan vessel, splendidly illuminated, and full of Arabs in their gay dress. Two military bands played alternately, and Catherine wheels and Bengal lights enhanced the gorgeous theatrical scene of Oriental magnificence. Inside coffee and pipes were proffered, and MANSOUR was very courteous. Greeks were dancing, and a buffoon knocking away conunical-shaped paper hats. Here, too, there had been festivities for the last three days. They were brought to a close yesterday morning. In the afternoon the Pasha's young wife was conducted to him draped, from the palace of her mother, at Kasr-Aali. It was a very grand procession. The Viceroy, attended by his son and Ministers, saw it as it passed from the palace the Prince and Princess of Wales inhabited when here. His Highness had invited a numerous assemblage of ladies and gentlemen. First came a squadron of dragoons, afterward another squadron of cuirassiers, and then followed venerable looking men, with grizzly hair, long, flowing robes and white turbans, on horseback. With their regimental bands playing, the two squadrons wheeled slowly round the palace, and then, after the Arabs holding prominent places in the viceroyal household, had formed in line in view. They were preceded by mounted officers, and an avant garde of pioneers, with bear skins, white leather aprons and axes. Then there were the men, headed by their bands playing the lively Zouave pas, and dressed as such also. Afterward the strains of more martial music announced more battalions of fresh-arriving troops, dressed like French voltigeurs. Again, elderly Arabs on horseback followed the cortège, and presently there came carriages drawn by pairs of horses, and driven by gold-laced-coated coachmen. The carriage after carriage moved on, displaying every conceivable shape, a veiled face at times peeped out from the draped windows. And presently gaily-dressed servants led on splendidly-appointed carriages and four, until, more splendid than all, there came the gilt coach containing the bride. Powdered servants sat on the boxes, and others walked at the horses' heads. It was altogether a very brilliant pageant. The procession reached MANSOUR PASHA'S at about 5 o'clock, and in the evening the Viceroy gave a grand ball at Gezireh Palace, in honor of the marriage, which was continued with the usual spirit until a late hour this morning. The Viceroy and his son were present.

New Costumes.

The Spring novelties, although fantastic, are exceedingly pretty and picturesque. Mme. ELISE has introduced several new costumes, which are likely to be successes. I will describe two, so as to give your readers some idea of the prevailing styles. First, there is the "Florinda" costume, which Mme. ELISE makes in all colors, but which I shall describe in blue, A Sévres blue silk petticoat, trimmed with five pinked-out flounces, the fifth carried up each side as high as the waist; above this skirt there is a sort of redingote made of striped blue and gray silk, (the material is rich in quality.) This redingote opens and is rounded off in front; it is very much bunched up at the sides and in the centre of the back, and is edged with a flounce to match, headed by a double coquille of blue satin. A coquille ruche trims the front of the bodice, and the sleeves have a large revers of striped silk lined with blue satin. The waistband and sash are likewise lined with satin. Then there is the "Marly," which can be worn with almost every variety of toilette. It is made of black point de sole; the basque, which is divided into four parts, is festooned and gathered up in that peculiar manner impossible to describe with words. It looks very rich and graceful, and is trimmed all round with black guipure, headed with a ruche made partly of silk and partly of satin; above the ruche there is a second row of guipure sewn flat. The sash describes a double fan at the back, and the ends that fall on the basque consist entirely of guipure; the sleeves are likewise trimmed with guipure. For the grandes élegantes, Mme. ELISE makes the "Marly," either in grenadine or China crêpe, and trims it with feather fringe. It can be made low and cut square, if desired, and a small white crepe fichu is worn inside, or, what is more original, a black gauze fichu. The "Marly" is worn over a silk petticoat—blue, mauve or green—which is elaborately trimmed with ruches, and appears to hang with a thousand capricious folds. A Dauphin hat, made in black lace, and trimmed with shaded roses; boots usually of bronze kid, high LOUIS XVI. heels, accompany the toilette.—Paris Correspondent of the Queen.

A Noble Mother.

The Paris correspondent of the London Star writes: "In a correspondence from Cairo published by one of your contemporaries, giving an account of the visit paid by the Viceroy of Egypt to M. DE LESSEPS' town, Ismailia, the fact is mentioned of His Highness having been received at the house of M. VOISIN, the distinguished engineer to whose talent M. DE LESSEPS owes so much. M. VOISIN gave a bal costumé in honor of the Viceroy's visit. Having been acquainted with him since his childhood, I am able to give you some interesting details as to his life, and this I do with all the greater pleasure, as his brilliant career is a fresh proof of the success which inevitably crowns great talent combined with dauntless perseverance. In a narrow lane, called Le Passage des Deux Portes, at Versailles, may still be seen a low public-house, surmounted by a signboard, on which is painted an immense green pear, beneath which are the words, 'A la poire verte,' (to the Green Pear.) This tavern was frequented by workmen, and kept by a respectable and intelligent widow, a Norman by birth, and who never up to the last hour of her life gave up her costume of a Norman peasant. She had two sons: at an early age both these boys displayed remarkable intelligence, and of this fact the mother determined to avail herself. By rigid economy she managed not only to send them to school, but thence to college. There her boys carried off every prize. The eldest, the one who last week entertained the Viceroy of Egypt, won the first prize for mathematics at the Sorbonne, and entered the Ecolle Polytechnique. His brother followed his example, and is now a Captain in the artillery. The engineer, appointed as Government Civil Engineer at Boulogne, built the splendid jetty which was inaugurated by the Emperor, on which occasion His Majesty took off the cross attached to his own uniform and bestowed it on M. VOISIN. M. DE LESSEPS was only too glad to secure the services of so distinguished and scientific a man, and at once intrusted him with one of the most important positions as regards the creation of the Isthmus. The mother of these noble sons is dead, but as long as she lived her two children were more than devoted—they were proud of her; and many a time I have seen the old lady, simply clad in her peasant's dress, walking on the tapis vert of the Versailles Park, amid the ancienne noblesse which congregate there of a Sunday to listen to the band, with her sons in uniforms at each side of her, respected and almost venerated by all who knew the story of her life."

Ancient Electric Telegraphy.

Sir BERNARD BURKE writes: "I have just been reading Arthur Young's Travels in France, second edition, published in 1794, seventy-two years since, by W. RICHARDSON, Royal Exchange, London; and at page 79, Vol. I., I find an entry in YOUNG'S diary, dated October 16, 1787, which goes, I think, a great way toward establishing the fact that a French mechanic, one M. LOMOND, had then, A.D. 1787, seventy-nine years ago, in actual operation in Paris an electric telegraph. Here is the passage to which I allude: 'Oct. 16, 1787—IN the evening to Mons. LOMOND, a very ingenious and inventive mechanic, who has made an improvement in the jenny for spinning cotton. In electricity he has made a remarkable discovery. You write two or three words on a paper; he takes it with him into a room and turns a machine inclosed in a cylindrical case, at the top of which is an electrometer, a small fine pith ball; a wire connects with a similar cylinder and electrometer in a distant apartment, and his wife, by remarking the corresponding motions of the ball, writes down the words they indicate; from which it appears that he has formed an alphabet of motions. As the length of the wires makes no difference in the effect, a correspondence might be carried on at any distance—within and without a besieged town, for instance. Whatever the use may be, the invention is beautiful. Is it not possible that the poor French mechanic may have perished in the Revolution, and his mighty invention with him?"

More Reports About the Peace Negotiations in 1864.

Roanoke County (Va.) Correspondence of the Wheeling Register.

While in Marion, Smyth County, a few days ago, I had the pleasure of several lengthy chats with Hon. FAYETTE MCMULLIN. Mr. MCMULLIN says that since the war, he was one day in the President's house in Washington, conversing with Hon. F. BLAIR, Sr. Mr. BLAIR told him that soon after MCMULLIN'S "peace resolutions" had been introduced into the Confederate Congress, Mr. LINCOLN, being extremely anxious to bring about a peace, honorable alike to both sections of the country, and foreseeing, and wishing to avoid, the political consequences of the military subjugation of the South, sent him (Mr. BLAIR) to Richmond to confer with Mr. DAVIS and learn what arrangement of the difficulties could be made. He was passed through the lines of the contending armies and conducted to Mr. DAVIS' house in Richmond. After a long conversation with Mr. DAVIS and other prominent gentlemen for whom Mr. DAVIS sent, and for whom Mr. BLAIR inquired, Mr. DAVIS said that he had no proposition to make. Mr. BLAIR then proposed that General LEE'S army be marched into Mexico against the French; that General GRANT would follow and support the movement; that the united armies would drive out MAXIMILIAN; and then the Southern States should name their own terms of reconstruction, everything short of independence being guaranteed. At Mr. DAVIS' request this proposition was made in writing, and, after some consultation and reflection, was signed and accepted by him. Mr. BLAIR returned to Washington, and Mr. LINCOLN was highly delighted with the success of the negotiation. It was in the hope of consummating this arrangement that Mr. LINCOLN and Mr. SEWARD met the "Peace Commissioners," Hons. STEPHENS, HUNTER and CAMPBELL, at Fortress Monroe; but there, to Mr. LINCOLN'S chagrin, the Committee declared that they had been instructed by Mr. DAVIS to insist upon the independence of the South, and would listen to no other proposal. And thus the whole affair came to a "most lame and impotent conclusion."

Such is the substance of the account related to Governor MCMULLIN by Mr. BLAIR. Mr. MCMULLIN says that he asked and obtained Mr. BLAIR'S permission to make the statement public, but he had refrained from giving it publicity pending Mr. DAVIS' trial, fearing lest it might in some way prejudice his case.

A Reminiscence of Libby Prison—Sudden Death of a Courageous and Faithful Negro.

From the Washington Chronicle, April 28.

Yesterday a colored laborer in the Treasury Department, named ROBERT FORD, died about 2 P. M., while sitting in a chair in the lower hall of the building. He had complained of feeling ill during the day, and had bathed his head with water to relieve the pain. The body was conveyed to the home of the deceased on Capitol Hill.

Hon. JOHN C. SHANKS, of Indiana, furnishes us some information relative to the eventful history of the deceased, which is of so much interest that we print it in full:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 27, 1869.

To the Editor of the Chronicle:

Another victim of rebel barbarity has passed away.

ROBERT FORD, a colored man, fell dead at his post of duty in the Treasury building to-day.

ROBERT FORD is the man who, under instruction of Mrs. ABIGAIL GREEN, of Richmond, Va., gave information, measurements, &c., to the Union prisoners in Libby Prison, by which 109 of them were enabled to escape from their place of death, for which FORD was arrested and, under order of the notorious General JOHN H. WINDER, whipped by the infamous DICK TURNER, of Libby Prison notoriety, with 500 lashes.

FORD was laid across a barrel, face downward, and while four chivalric scoundrels held his hands and feet, the infamous DICK TURNER, with a strap fastened to a staff, inflicted the full sentence on his bared back. Long before this barbaric work was accomplished, the victim was wholly insensible, but with chivalric courage, these tools of tyranny applied the lash upon his senseless form with unabated vigilance and valor until the 500 were all administered.

FORD was raised at Frederick, Md.; was a teamster in General BANKS' command, and was captured at Strasburg, Va., and instead of being treated as a prisoner of war, was put on duty as a laborer in the stables attached to Libby Prison; and, touched with the infamous treatment of our prisoners, his sympathy prompted him to risk life itself for them, and, under the advice of Mrs. GREEN, rendered the assistance to the prisoners which secured their escape and his terrible punishment and subsequent death. From that hour FORD has never been well. He lay six weeks helpless, and then made his escape to Washington, which took him six weeks more—during which time he was several times arrested and compelled to work with his back lacerated from his neck to his hips with the lash, but did not dare complain, for the condition of his person would have compelled an explanation and an arrest and return to certain death. His back has never healed permanently, nor his health returned. FORD bore it all, and though sometimes compelled to travel back toward Richmond until he could again shape his excuses and his course, he finally reached Washington. Congress gave him $600 for his services and suffering in the Union cause—and recently he was employed as a laborer in the Treasury building. FORD never saw a well moment since his cruel treatment at the hands of that Richmond rebel, and to-day died, and added one more to the vast number of victims to rebel cruelty.

FORD was a prisoner of war, and entitled to be treated as such, but the Confederacy, founded upon crimes against FORD'S race, became his executioner, through J. H. WINDER, who died before FORD did, and DICK TURNER, who is a drunken sot, presenting the worthlessness of the inebriate as his only virtue, as it is preparatory to a judgment where he will soon meet FORD, with WINDER for the only witness in his defence, in a court where the character of the witness and defendant are both well known, and where ROBERT FORD, the poor but honest, charitable negro man, standing on his single integrity, will condemn them both.

FORD and the facts connected with the cause of his death are to me well known; the nation owes him a debt of gratitude.

JOHN P. C. SHANKS.

The First Bibles Printed in America.

From the Hartford Courant, April 28.

The building, just south of the Ætna Fire Company's block, recently torn down to make room for the improvements being made by the Charter Oak Life Company, had something of a history which the Courant ought to record. HUDSON & GOODWIN, more than sixty years ago, erected the building to be used for the publication of the Courant and for job printing purposes. Our old inhabitants remember that firm well; its name was recognized all through this section of the State, and was honored too. Here in this building the first Bibles ever printed in this country were produced. At a large expense, the printed matter all set up, was brought over the Atlantic from London in forty or fifty "chases." The finest minion type was used. So choice were these "forms" that a fire-proof building was erected, in which they were stored, together with the presses used. Each "chase" contained twelve pages, and was worked, of course, separately. Thousands upon thousands of these Bibles were printed and bound and furnished to the Connecticut Bible Society. Copies are still in existence in all parts of the State.

The Burning of the Boston Ship King Philip at Honolulu.

From the Honolulu Commercial Advertiser, March 20.

About 11 o'clock on Thursday night the anchor watch on board the American ship King Philip discovered smoke coming from her hatches and immediately raised an alarm. The mate and some of the men went into her hold, and found the fire among the dunnage in the bows of the vessel, on the starboard side; and finding the fire beyond their control, sent a boat to the United States steamer Ossipee, lying near her, for assistance. The King Philip lay in the stream, with a hawser to the new steamboat wharf and with one anchor down. The Fire Department was on the wharf soon after the alarm. Hose was led on board from the engines, and from the hydrant, through the Hose Company's hose. The Chief-Engineer, C. E. WILLIAMS, went on board, where he met the officer and men from the Ossipee, and found that the opinion prevailed that the ship should be scuttled. Acting on this opinion the valuables were taken out of the cabin and removed to the war ship. Mr. WILLIAMS immediately countermanded all orders to that effect, and issued orders to have her hauled to the wharf, feeling confident of the ability of the Fire Department to save her if she could be got where they could work to advantage. The greatest confusion prevailed on board, and assistance from the shore was obtained to get the chain unshackled and the vessel in to the dock, which she reached after 4 o'clock. Many still believed that the ship would burn up unless scuttled. Once alongside the wharf, the firemen worked with a will, and water was poured into her thick and fast through holes cut in the deck and openings through the bows. For hours it seemed as though the firemen must be driven from their positions. Several times fire could be seen through the bow seams, and the heat and smoke were suffocating. Between 8 and 9 o'clock

NEWS OF THE DAY.

EUROPE.

The Spanish Cortes were still engaged in discussing Church matters yesterday. The prerogative of the Crown in matters ecclesiastical is to be maintained under the new Constitution.

The English journals continue to discuss Senator SUMNER's speech on the Alabama claims with avidity. The Times contends that the proclamation of neutrality was a prohibition, and not an authorization of blockade-runners.

Instructions have been forwarded to the British naval officer commanding the West India Squadron, to demand the restitution of the brig Mary Powell, and an apology from the Spanish authorities.

The Russian Government is persevering in the line of moderate and judicious progress. The Council of State is devising means for enlarging the powers of the local municipalities, and the Press laws are to be modified in a liberal sense.

SOUTH AMERICA.

According to latest advices, the partisans of LOPEZ are both numerous and active in certain districts of Paraguay; and his cause does not appear so desperate as has recently been imagined.

By the arrival of the steamship Alaska we are in receipt of mail news from the United States of Colombia and from all the Central and South American countries. The most important intelligence was to the effect that a reaction of feeling in regard to the Cushing Canal treaty had taken place in Bogota, caused principally by the apprehension that in case the National Government did not ratify it the State of Panama might secede and take the matter into its own hands. A petition was sent up from the House of Representatives to the Senate for that body to reconsider its vote. It was reported in Santa Martha, however, that the Senate refused to reconsider it. It is not impossible, thinks our correspondent, however, that the treaty, in a modified form, may yet be ratified. The letter which contains the news from the countries referred to above also embodies an account of the destruction by fire of the steamship America while en route from Panama to San Francisco, with much interesting intelligence.

MEXICO.

The rebel Colonel PALACIO, with a force of about 400 men, has been meeting with considerable success, and has defeated General DARA in a regular engagement. In the State of Durango, CONTRERAS has pronounced in his favor. The county appears to be in a very disturbed condition.

The Tribune and the Bureau of Statistics

The Tribune having found its recent assaults upon Mr. WELLS, personally, as little productive of profit or pleasure as the gnawing of files proverbially is to him that indulges in it, has turned to attack the Special Commissioner of the Revenue in his relations to the Bureau of Statistics; and, in a labored article in its issue of Thursday, charges upon the "free traders of the Bureau of Statistics" the intentional suppression of the figures of our Domestic Exports, particularly and most grievously, it seems, in articles of woodenware, for the purpose of disparaging the manufacturing industry of the country. This, it alleges, has been done in the accounts for "1866, 1867 and 1868." The most amusing part of this is that the accounts for 1868 were made up on a classification of commodities which was furnished to Collectors of Customs, prior, at least, to June 30, 1867, that is, more than eighteen months before Mr. WELLS had any official connection whatever with the Bureau; while the accounts for 1866 must have been made up from a classification furnished prior to June 30, 1865, or at least one year and twenty-seven days before the Bureau of Statistics was created, or Mr. DELMAR had come to Washington on his mission of Advanced Arithmetic.

If any parties have been guilty of "suppressing" the facts of our industry for sinister and unpatriotic purposes, they are not parties at present or at any time known to the Bureau of Statistics, since the classification of commodities used in the commercial returns of "1866, 1867 and 1868" was prepared long before the avatar of ALEXANDER DELMAR, or the creation of the Statistical Bureau.

But, not satisfied with such culpable recklessness in charging criminal intention upon public officers, the Tribune blunders even more sadly in its figures. The report of commerce and navigation for 1868, which it quotes with so much assurance, is not yet published, owing to the press of matter on the hands of the public printer. Where, then, does the Tribune get its figures. Out of the preliminary report, which is habitually published in connection with the "Finance Report" of the Secretary of the Treasury, long before the full details of the trade of the year can be prepared. This preliminary report only assumes to give the main facts, leaving the more extended classification to the report proper of commerce and navigation. Out of this the Tribune selects the formidable item, "Other manufactured articles not specified, $8,501,138," and charges upon the Special Commissioner of the Revenue the intention to "suppress" the details of this gigantic industry, when the fact is, if the writer had only had sense or candor enough he must have seen that this includes many items which are specifically enumerated in the reports of the Bureau of Statistics—though the Secretary of the Treasury, in his report, did not think it worth while to give all the particulars. If the Tribune writer will curb his eager soul until the Congressional Printer finds time to work off the sheets of accounts now and for some months in his hands, he will find this formidable amount of "unenumerated" reduced from $8,501,138 to $1,863,865, including the whole body of minor and nondescript "notions" made by our people out of every fabric or material under Heaven. Then the Tribune can delight its readers for many successive days with accounts and descriptions, literal, figurative and pictorial, if it likes, and its readers can stand it, of all the wooden pails, wooden spiggots, wooden clothes-pins and wooden nutmegs which it berates the Special Commissioner of the Revenue for concealing from the public gaze. We doubt not the Secretary of the Treasury would consent, under adequate representations from our neighbor, to give a descriptive title, if not a pet name, to every broom-handle that leaves the country hereafter, to spread the renown of American manufactures. Heaven knows the Tribune and its friends are doing their best to reduce our exports within limits "conveniently small" for the minutest classification.

Cuba and Mexico.

The Mexican Congress has passed a resolution, 100 to 12, authorizing the Executive to recognize the Cuban revolutionists as belligerents whenever he may deem it convenient to do so:—and the President has already ordered that their flag shall be admitted into all the ports of the Republic. Thus, says the Cuban agent, "is Mexico the first nation to manifest by official acts its generous sympathy with the Cuban revolution."

There can be no objection to this action, so far as Cuba is concerned; but it must be a little mortifying to the United States to be thus outstripped in the matter of recognition by the other great Republic of the Western Continent. How it happened we cannot understand. It certainly is not the fault of General BANKS. Probably it is because Mexico has nothing to do at home, and can, therefore, afford to devote all her time and energies to the affairs of other nations. Everything relating to her internal condition is in such a state of unexampled prosperity;—peace and order are so thoroughly reëstablished throughout the country;—her finances are in such admirable condition;—public confidence is so firm and unshaken; the Courts of justice are so just and regular in their operation, violence and crime have so thoroughly disappeared that nothing remains to be done at home, and the whole class of Mexican statesmen are at full liberty to turn their attention to the affairs of Cuba. This is probably the reason of their having got ahead of us in the matter of recognizing the belligerent rights of the "rebels."

There can, of course, be no doubt of our good intentions in the matter. Ever since England set us so splendid an example in April, 1861, by recognizing the belligerent rights of our rebels, it is well known we have been eager beyond expression to ingraft the principle upon the code of international law, and to adopt it as our own. Several attempts of the sort have been made, but they have been defeated, mainly by circumstances over which we have had no control. The exigencies of a new Administration,—especially the paramount necessity of changing all the office-holders of the country,—have rendered it difficult to give the affairs of other countries the careful attention which they require. But we shall soon be rid of this trouble. Mr. WASHBURNE sailed for France on Saturday; Mr. PILE's case is to receive speedy attention;—the Postmaster at Podunk has got his commission; and the great work of filling the offices can be handed over to subordinates.

Our finances require no special care; reconstruction takes care of itself, and we shall soon be at leisure to attend to Cuba, Canada and the rest of mankind. Happy is the nation that attends to everybody's business but it's own! Look at Mexico, for example.

Politics versus Science.

We are not of those who have snarled at every appointment made by President GRANT because he selected men that he knew something about; for although he has, like every President who preceded him, made some mistakes, the great majority of his appointments are either good or to be judged only by their fruits. Most of the prominent candidates for the Presidential nomination were men whose affiliations were with political parties, and their appointments, in President GRANT's place, would have been among men no less known to them as personal friends and party helpers, but better known to the public perhaps as "public men." The most of the President's appointes may be trusted, we believe, to let their official acts be their commendation.

Yet under the tremendous pressure for office, probably unparalleled in the country's history, and certainly an absolute and severe novelty in Gen. GRANT's experience, we think he has permitted the influential ones to persuade him into an erroneous principle, that of making changes without due reason. Not that this is not common enough, and, indeed, the rule of our political life; but that we had hoped to see it ignored.

One illustration was the proposed removal of Mr. Appraisor MCELRATH. That was simply an unnecessary change. But a more serious class of cases is the displacement of experienced men from positions requiring scientific training, and the substitution of less competent persons.

The scientific papers are just now grumbling, with some show of reason, over the Mint appointments. In the American Journal of Mining we find, for two consecutive weeks, articles complaining of this matter. In the first place, Mr. LINDEMANN, the late Director of the Mint, although not a man thoroughly competent for the position, was a fair officer and an estimable gentleman; so that the scientific men of the country, while anxious in these days of international discussion about problems of coinage and the treatment of the precious metals to have the United States represented by accomplished and experienced experts, did not make any effort to remove him, although there were many better men for the place. Suddenly it is announced that a vacancy is made and as immediately filled by the nomination of Governor POLLOCK, of Pennsylvania, whose "principal claims to the position are the facts that he had it once before, and that, while he had it, he caused the motto, 'In God we trust,' to be put on some of the coin of the United States. In other respects, he is not prepared to discharge the duties of the office as they should be discharged."

Mr. LINDEMANN was a Democrat, and Mr. POLLOCK is a Republican, which probably covers the whole ground; with the additional point that the United States Mint is regarded not only as a proper portion of the political spoils, but as a portion belonging especially to Philadelphia—two preposterous notions.

A similar error has been made in the changes in the San Francisco Mint. Mr. MARTIN, the Assayer out there, is a trained expert in the service of the Mint. He was for years one of the valued assistants of Dr. TORREY, in the United States Assay Office in New-York, (an officer, by the way, whose retention in the position he has now filled for twenty-five years, through all administrations, is at once a witness to his integrity and ability, and a wonder of good sense in the Government.) Mr. MARTIN, who, besides being a thoroughly efficient officer, is also a thorough Republican, has been removed, and superseded by a gentleman who may or may not be as well qualified for the place, but who certainly was not needed to supply any deficiency.

Unnecessary changes in office are the curse and bane of our civil service. In fact, when we compare our ricketty, inefficient, unsystematized, chaotic, impotent style of public service with the generally compact and easy-working machinery of European countries, we are tempted to wish for what we know are very costly luxuries. But the harmony of democratic principles with a conservative and well-regulated civil service, we believe to be quite possible. And we long for the day when Mr. JENCKES' admirable suggestions shall be taken up in earnest by Congress.

It is not necessary to throw all the blame on the President. Congress and the people make the custom, and he administers it as well as he can. But such unfortunate blows at the most important and useful branches of the public service, ought to be by law made impossible.

This is a fruitful theme, and when Congress meets again we shall hope to see the whole system held up to the ridicule it deserves, and some attempt, at least, made to secure for the people a better one.

Not Concerned.

In speaking of the charge against Mr. J. R. YOUNG, of having sent dispatches of the Associated Press surreptitiously to a Philadelphia paper that was not entitled to receive them, the Tribune says:

"This charge involves the interests of others whose right to a searching investigation is unquestionable. We call, therefore, upon our partners in the Associated Press to institute forthwith a rigorous scrutiny, before some impartial arbiter or tribunal, of the charges against Mr. Young with regard to the dispatches of the Association."

We see no necessity for such an investigation. It is a matter of not the slightest concern to the Associated Press. Mr. YOUNG holds no relations with the Association, is not responsible to it, or known to it in any way. He is simply an employe of the Tribune, and responsible, so far as we are aware, to nobody else for his professional conduct. Some months ago, during the period covered by Mr. YOUNG's alleged misconduct, the members of the Associated Press discovered that the news belonging to them was surreptitiously sold to a Philadelphia paper not entitled to receive it, and through the skill and perseverance of their agent, Mr. SIMONTON, they traced the delinquency to the Tribune office. What particular person in the Tribune office was guilty of the betrayal, was a matter with which the Association had nothing whatever to do. It was the business of the Tribune to watch and regulate the conduct of its subordinates; and it was to the Tribune only that the Association had to look for a correction of the evil. The Association did deal with the Tribune in the matter, and the abuse was stopped. Whether the proprietors of the Tribune have detected and dealt with their guilty and treacherous subordinates, is their affair, and no business of the Associated Press. The whole matter was disposed of long ago so far as the rights and interests of the Association were involved: that body, so far as we can see, has no reason for reopening it or making any further "investigation" in regard to it.

English Literary Gentlemen at Dinner—The Dickens Banquet.

The people of Liverpool recently determined to show their respect for Mr. CHARLES DICKENS by inviting him to a public banquet. We some time ago set them the example in this country, and after what has taken place we shall not be accused of vanity if we say that we wish our example had been more closely followed. There were a number of gentlemen connected with literary pursuits present at the New-York dinner, but they did not set to work rending each other instead of their food. They came to pay a compliment to Mr. DICKENS, and they considerately refrained from quarreling over their salt. We may, perhaps, assume that the irritable craft have their disagreements in America no less than in England, but they are not so constantly dragging them before the public eye. Our English friends met at Liverpool only to prove to the general public what a mistake it is to ask the "literary gent" out to dinner at all. It is better to leave him with his mutton chop and pint of ale at home. Many people are very curious to see the man who wrote some favorite book, but they would preserve their illusions much better if they restrained the desire, and contented themselves with the ideal.

Of course the "Liverpudlians"—for by that engaging name the people of Liverpool seem to be called—could not ask Mr. DICKENS to dine alone. They managed, therefore to get a few "distinguished" friends to meet him. There was Mr. ANTHONY TROLLOPE, who has undoubtedly achieved a merited distinction. There was Mr. HEPWORTH DIXON, who has distinguished himself chiefly by the art with which he incessantly puffs his own books in his own paper, the Athenæum. There was Lord HOUGHTON, who thinks that next to being a glorified spirit among the cherubim and seraphim, it is best to be a lord. Then came Mr. HALLIDAY, a dramatic author, and Mr. G. A. SALA—the latter a very hardworking man, to say the very least of him. Finally there was Mr. CHORLEY, a musical critic, and Mr. DOLBY, Mr. DICKENS' man-of-all-work. These were the literary gentlemen present. We should have thought that England might have done better, but it is no business of ours to find fault on this score. It is evident that English men of letters dearly love each other.

We may presume that the dinner was sufficiently good. At any rate, its effects were those which appear to be very frequently produced upon the British sensibilities by heavy fare and strong drinks. Lord DUFFERIN's eloquence corresponded with the temperament of his audience. The influence of ladies upon public speakers is so much dreaded in England that they shut the fair sex behind a brass screen in the House of Commons, so that they shall not be seen. We may discover from Lord DUFFERIN's case that the precaution is not entirely unnecessary. He tuned his song, like an ancient troubadour, to please the ladies' ears. But the very fact that he soared high saved him from treading on any of his neighbors' toes. Lord HOUGHTON was not so fortunate. He is a lord himself, and rejoices so greatly in the fact, that like a good-natured man he wishes all his friends were lords too. He reproached Mr. DICKENS for not being sufficiently civil to this exalted order of beings, and also with not having taken any active part in political life. This was the beginning of strife, which, as we all know, is like the letting out of water. Mr. DICKENS, on the principle of never letting a chance for a free fight pass by unimproved, hit out manfully at poor Lord HOUGHTON. The amiable nobleman, who never meant any harm in his life, must have been horrified at the mischief he had done. Mr. DICKENS was so intent upon administering punishment to Lord HOUGHTON that he almost forgot to talk about himself—a circumstance that must have given some of his audience reason to fear that his memory was not quite what it used to be. He recovered himself in time to vow solemnly that he would never break the "bargain" he had made with Literature. It has been so good a bargain for him that we commend his resolution and greatly admire his spirit.

The "Liverpudlians," male and female, now saw their literary friends to great advantage. They wrangled over their cups, and the brawl became general. The reporters do not say that any bones were broken in the "melée," but very hard words were used. Mr. ANTHONY TROLLOPE ordered up Mr. FROUDE for flogging, and showed that he had come to the dinner prepared with his grievance. An English literary man, like an officer on half-pay, always carries a personal wrong about with him. He thinks it amuses his friends, or otherwise he would not be always talking about it. But Mr. TROLLOPE was eclipsed by Mr. HEPWORTH DIXON, the author of several vapid books and one highly improper one, founded in style on Lord MACAULAY, and in general sentiment on PAUL DE KOCK. Mr. DIXON's grievance was twofold—professional and personal, and such a combination makes up a grievance of the most portentous kind. The proprietor of the Athenæum was made a Baronet for the skill with which he administered to the self-love of a great personage now deceased. But Mr. DIXON, the greater man of the two, is left to pine in comparative obscurity. Therefore, he rated the political institutions of his country in a manner which the worthy Liverpudlians considered totally beside the object of the meeting. They even presumed to interrupt Mr. DIXON. Had they broken into a church on Sunday and pulled the parson out of his pulpit, they could not more have shocked the imaginative author of Spiritual Wives. Still, when a man is hissed he must sit down. Mr. DIXON gave way to Mr. ESQUIROS, who, with what seems a touch of French irony, expressed his gratification on being present at a fête d'intelligence. He obviously meant a fête de colère. Then Mr. HALLIDAY abused everybody because "the drama" had not been toasted. Mr. SALA himself called Mr. DICKENS his master, and admitted that the said master had first induced him to follow literature as a profession. How many times Mr. SALA must have been in anything but a grateful mood toward his kind and affectionate master!

Mr. DIXON complains that he and his fellows are not well treated in England. It seems that he has very little reason for this querulousness. Mr. DIXON himself has recently been placed on the Commission of the Peace, simply by virtue of the literary influence he possesses. It is quite true that men of letters are often chosen to fill distinguished positions by the United States Government. So they are in England, Mr. DISRAELI is a literary man, and has before now declared that he is proud of it. English literary men are not, as a rule, sent abroad as foreign Ministers, because it is the custom of the country to choose such officials from the regular ranks of the diplomatic service. There is a good deal to be said for the custom—this, among other things, that men are not sent to foreign Courts ignorant of the language of the people among whom they are to reside. They have received a certain degree of training for their work. But the ranks of Consuls are often recruited in England from journalists and authors. Mr. CHARLES LEVER, the novelist, thus represents his country abroad. Mr. G. P. R. JAMES did so likewise, and died in the Consular service. Mr. HANNAY, a journalist, was recently appointed to a similar post. There are many other cases of the kind if Mr. DIXON chose to search for them. But suppose the Premier of England fairly met Mr. DIXON's argument by saying: "You literary men constantly show so great a lack of judgment that it is unsafe to give you public employment. You seem to be totally unaccustomed to the exercise of any control over your tempers, and to go about the world ready to take offence at anything and everything which may not exactly chime in with your humor. Look at the scene which took place at this Liverpool dinner of yours. Respect for your entertainers did not restrain you from making impertinent remarks to each other, or from obtruding topics which were completely out of place at such an assembly. How can you ask to be sent to manage other people's affairs when you cannot arrange your own without scandal? You seem to be devoured with jealousy of each other, and you ask the world to show a respect for a calling which you do all you can to bring into contempt and disesteem." Suppose, we repeat, a Government addressed Mr. DIXON and his friends in this way? They would admit, if they were candid—which is very unlikely—that the reproaches were well deserved. Would an Ambassadorship have made Mr. DICKENS better off than he is? At this moment he is receiving £100 for reading two hours at a time from his own works. He enjoys this well-paid recreation three or four times a week. Is Mr. MOTLEY so remunerated? Has he a wider influence to boast of than Mr. DICKENS?

Mr. DIXON mistakes altogether the true position of the class with which he has condescended to associate himself. When a literary man can find enough work to do he ought to desire nothing better. He has chosen his occupation, and has no right to rail at the world because Governments do not implore him on their bended knees to help them. When a man takes to writing reviews or leading articles or books, he ought not to accuse mankind of ingratitude because it does not seek to withdraw him from his chosen sphere of duty, and place him in another sphere for which he is, in all probability, totally unfitted. The author does nothing more than other men. He supplies the world with a certain article, and so long as the world wants it, it is paid for at—its true value—more often than not, beyond it. If it be true, for instance, that such a book as the Tower of London has run through six editions, as Mr. DIXON boasts in his journal, surely Mr. DIXON has been well paid for a very frivolous and valueless performance. The public, as many will think, are already too generous toward him. The honor of literature is not promoted by its servants claiming the high places of the earth. In nine times out of ten they muddle everything which lies an inch outside their beaten track, and in England, where men are mentally less flexible and less versatile than here, their incapacity for practical business has passed into a proverb. Mr. DICKENS himself rebuked his admirers for their repinings, and he would be a very ungrateful man if he had taken any other course.

The City Upside Down.

The house-movers had a frightful time of it yesterday—what with the rain and the mud and the universal offensiveness of things. The extent of the wrath, ill-nature and disgust was altogether beyond computation: and while husbands were furious, wives miserable, and children screaming in all parts of the City—while furniture was smashed and spoiled, costly carpets and other articles ruined by rain—while collisions were taking place between outgoing and incoming tenants—it might have appeared that bedlam was let loose and chaos come again. Though a good deal of the moving was done on Friday, there were a very large number of people who delayed the inevitable change till the last possible hour—and a worse hour they could not easily have chosen.

To prevent this annual uproar and confusion of May-day, we have several times lately suggested the adoption of the system of house-renting that is prevalent in the English cities and in many American cities. We have proposed that tenants should have the right to move from their house at any quarter day of the year, upon giving three months' notice to the landlords. The adoption of this very simple method would relieve people from all the loss and inconvenience of the present system. Of course many landlords would oppose this reform, though we believe it would be for the advantage of the whole community. To a considerable extent, however, tenants have even yet the opportunity of adopting it.

There are a great many residences throughout the City still unrented. The large number of people who have moved out of town have left many houses vacant, and landlords are of course anxious to secure tenants as quickly as possible. In many cases tenants can secure conditions now which they could not have secured some months or weeks ago. Why should not the tenants who will yet take these vacant houses, take them on the condition we have indicated—that is to say, rent them with the understanding that they can leave them at the end of any quarter, after notifying the landlord in advance.

Were a beginning made in this way it would be the beginning of the end of the abominable system which prevails in New-York, and which causes confusion and misery all over town during the moving season every year.

Cuban Strategy.

BUTLER—(Not the General, but the poet, o that name) has assured us that—

> Those that fly may fight again,
> Which he can never do that's slain.

Or, as our popular phraseology has coined the same idea from an older mintage, that of the Musarum Delicioe:

> He that fights and runs away
> May live to fight another day.

The Fabian strategy adopted hitherto by CESPEDES and QUESADA, undoubtedly takes cognizance of this thought. But the truth is that we affix the poet's couplet to the Cuban policy in no disparaging way. It may be affirmed of the Cubans with as much truth as of the Parthians, that "they conquer in flying." Had the insurgents been foolish enough to make head at once against the Spanish Power, and stake their cause on one hazard of the die, the fate of their attempt would long since have been sealed, and there would have been no "Cuban cause" distinct from DULCE's domination to-day.

But they were wiser. CESPEDES and his officers at once comprehended the situation, and have never been tempted out of the petty, but annoying and incessant warfare which saps Spanish strength more than pitched battles. For this policy there have been many motives. First, the few trained officers whom CESPEDES has with him, have been mostly experienced in guerilla operations—in Hayti, San Domingo, Mexico, Cuba, and elsewhere. Next, the insurgent armies are untrained, their opponents skilled and disciplined; on the one side are raw recruits from country towns; on the other, hardy veterans. Again, the season is now propitious for the Spaniards, while soon it will become an ally of the Cubans. Sickness has already made ten times more inroads in the ranks of the former than bullets, and soon the yellow fever will add its terrors to those of the climatic diseases. Summer and the rainy season are at hand, and when they come, it will be madness for the unacclimated troops to campaign with anything like severity.

Hence it is that the Spanish forces long for nothing so much as an enemy that will give them battle. They fret away their strength in searching him. To bring him to bay, they loudly taunt all Cubans as "cowards," and say (with some truth) that the latter usually run from the forces that attack them. But why not? It is the plan that is most likely to win. By and by, when the Spanish soldiers are worn with sickness, prostrated by the weather and by disease, disgusted and demoralized by beating the air, the Cubans, trained and disciplined at last, will be likely to give them more trouble than now. Hence, it is the Spanish policy to decide the affair off-hand. If this be done, the insurrection will probably soon be crushed; but the Cuban procrastination is among those delays that are not "dangerous."

The International Boat Race.

Now that the challenge of the Harvard crew for a four-oared race has been accepted by both of the English Universities—Oxford accepting absolutely, and Cambridge "conditionally," whatever that may mean—there can be no doubt that the long-talked of trial of strength will at last take place. The race has been fixed as a four-oared one, we presume, as being thus equally fair to the English boating clubs, which generally row in "eights," and to the American crew, more accustomed to six-oared contests. The race is to take place in August, and as the Harvard crew has consented to row with a coxswain, there is no reason why the course should not be that on the Thames always selected for the annual inter-university boat race, and within easy reach of the metropolis.

We are glad that the terms for a race have at last been settled, after such lengthy and, at one time, unpromising negotiations, and that there is a prospect of both Oxford and Cambridge being represented; and we only hope that an international yacht race, on a scale worthy of the name, could be arranged at or about the same time. The passionate fondness for aquatic sports of all kinds which characterizes both countries, furnishes an opportunity for pleasant intercourse between our gallant Harvard oarsmen and their transatlantic congeners, and between our adventurous yachtsmen and the amateur "jolly tars" of the Solent and the Channel. With regard to the boat race, our American champions have a hard task cut out for them; but they should not therefore give it up as hopeless, or neglect to avail themselves of every advantage that steady practice and training, or advice from more experienced hands, can give them. Their defeat—if it is to be a defeat—will not, we feel sure, be an inglorious one.

The Tory Rout on the Irish Church Question.

Mr. DISRAELI and his friends, finding all their attempts to defeat the Irish Church Bill, or to materially modify its principal details, unavailing, have devoted themselves to the task of saving, or trying to save, as much as possible out of the wreck in the interest of the Anglican Church. It was provided by the bill that all property, real or personal, left to the Irish Church by private individuals since the year 1660 should be retained. Mr. GREGORY, an Irish Tory, moved to substitute the year 1608. Mr. DISRAELI moved the omission of the original date, without proposing to substitute any other. Finally Mr. GATHORNE HARDY, the real leader of the Tories on all Church questions, proposed to fix the date at 1560—thus hoping to secure the inviolability of all property acquired by the Irish Church since the second year of Queen ELIZABETH and the practical establishment of the Reformation. Among such property, too, would be included the original benefactions of Archbishop USHER, given for the foundation of Trinity College, Dublin. But the House of Commons steadfastly refused to be led away from the programme originally laid down by their chiefs, and Mr. HARDY's motion was rejected by a majority of 86—not so large as that by which the main principle of the bill was affirmed, but still sufficiently large to show the hopelessness of all attempts to gain any better terms than those offered by Mr. GLADSTONE. Mr. DISRAELI's effort to save the globe-houses to the Church met with a similar fate, while the original clauses of the bill, by which the fabrics of the cathedrals were to be maintained as national property, have been expunged at the suggestion of an Irish Liberal member, supported by the full strength of the Ministerial... Altogether the Tories must see now that resistance is absolutely hopeless. They may attempt to embarrass the Government by forcing it into a premature declaration of policy on the Irish land question, but with regard to the Irish Church, their best tactics would be abstention and dignified silence.

MISCELLANEOUS

The question of emigration as a remedy for pauperism, or rather as a relief from its evils, is discussed in the British House of Commons. It is urged that the Government ought to contribute from its Treasury to enable its paupers to emigrate; and Mr. GOSCHEN, of the Poor Law Board, suggested that they should be aided to go to America. This proposition will need revision. We cannot object, of course, to England's sending her paupers to Canada or any of her other colonies; but she must not send them here. We do not want them, and shall not receive them. We may need laborers, but paupers are not laborers, and never become such either there or here. We trust our Consuls in Great Britain will be instructed to see to it that no such imposition as this is practiced upon us.

The telegraph, dating from Ottawa on Friday, informs us:

"Senator FESSENDEN, of Maine, is here, and was present in the House of Commons during a debate on reciprocity last night."

As we happen to be personally aware that on the evening mentioned Senator FESSENDEN was dining at the Union League Club-house, with Collector BAILEY and eight or ten friends, and that he left for Maine the next morning, we take the liberty of thinking that the reporter who sent the above is very much mistaken. It is possible that some wag or knave was passing himself off at Ottawa upon the innocent Canadians, and listening to the debates as Senator FESSENDEN, of Maine; but the Senator himself most assuredly was not there.

The work of relaying the pavement in Broadway has reached the New-York Hotel; and the sidewalks of the street are occupied by the contractors, with heaps of stone, as far up as STEWART'S. This is one of the many ingenious devices by which the public convenience is sacrificed and made to give place to the interests of contractors and jobbers. There is not another city in the world, (at least not of this country,) where such a thing would be tolerated. Here it is the regular rule. No regard whatever is paid to the comfort of the people; they are not treated as having any "rights." These belong only to contractors and City officials.

Acts of noble self-sacrifice and fortitude are so rare that we may note, in passing, the admirable example of a German, SHULZE DELITZSCH, of Berlin, as set forth in the letter of Mr. BRACE we recently published. Mr. DELITZSCH is the founder of the plan of coöperative banks, a social experiment well worthy the consideration of every workman. This gentleman's system, like his personal character, is very beautiful and praiseworthy.

"Summer set in with its customary severity" yesterday, over the débacle and driftage of ten thousand households, broken up like the ice in our great rivers on the approach of warm weather. To add to the miseries of removal, the rain came down to saturate the carpets and bedclothes, and make bad worse.

"The melancholy days are come,
The saddest of the year."

These lines should be taken from the Fall of the year, where Mr. BRYANT has placed them, and put to the account of the first week of May.

It was said General GRANT would pay California a visit this Summer, and the Californians and many others thought it would be a happy event, enhancing the interest of the great railroad inauguration. The men and women of the Golden State would be delighted to have the General among them for a week or so, giving them a double jubilee, and it is a pity he has no time to go. A President's visit is what is due to the Westerns in general and California in particular, and we hope General GRANT will yet be able to pay it. Those outlying Pacific States should be made to feel themselves in the family; and an occasional appearance among them of the "Great Father" would have the best possible effect all round.

"The city that deliberates is lost" might not be a true saying. At any rate, we hope it is not; for our New-York has a wonderful habit of deliberating and delaying before she decides on doing anything. "She never is, but always to be, blest" in the way of improvements. In that matter of Hell Gate, which is pretty much her own business, it seemed as if something would really be done. But SHELBURNE has boggled somehow, and General NEWTON and the rest "look wise and call a council." SHELBURNE'S pile is blown up, instead of Pot Rock. And yet, we suppose, men must live in hope. No doubt we shall have that passage cleared, and have a Post Office, and wharves, and boulevards, and wide streets and grand bridges—in time—about the close of the century—long before the Day of Judgment.

When MUMLER, the photograph wizard, saw Mr. BARNUM come into Court against him, he must have felt himself a lost man—have felt in fact, like JULIUS CESAR on a certain terrible occasion—only not using the same style of words, on account of the difference of age. They were once correspondents—MUMLER and BARNUM—and the latter, some years ago, got some of those spectral photographs for his Museum. The bonds of society have been strangely broken latterly; hawks pick out hawks' eyes, and correspondents who write private letters of goodwill and admiration to a great man are horrified to find them all printed in the morning newspapers. Birds of a feather can no longer rely on one another.

The velocipedes are going off the roads and into the "rinks;" and the exhibitionists are exploiting them in out-of-the-way lofts and underground cellars. They have become one more species of legerdemain. This, indeed, is the only use they can be reasonably put to, since they are too dear for the generality of young people and too dangerous for any but the harum-scarum boys and girls and other practitioners who can go through somersaults and live.

At a recent Convention of Sunday-School teachers, several suggestions were made on the best way of managing those schools. We have an idea that the great object should be to give children an interest in them—such as they do not feel at present. Boys and girls should have something attractive—lectures, for the whole school, on great and good men and actions—on topics of vital knowledge, with illustrations and anecdotes—panoramic views, with beautiful music to wind up with. The routine of the classes at present is very dull, and any sort of a change would be something for the better.

The Paris Avenir is very hard on NAPOLEON'S late letter about the Napoleonic anniversary, and with respect to "the guiding figure" of the first Emperor, declares it was a very bad guide to Russia and Spain, and "if it still guides us," a bad guide to Mexico recently. As regards "developing the virtues of the nation," it says NAPOLEON I. left behind him Senators and Marshals who were flunkeys and traitors. The Avenir also doubts the existence of any great number of those old soldiers who are to have the increased largesse. Neither does it at all want the large legendary eidolons, "but good citizens and honest statesmen, like GEORGE WASHINGTON." The Avenir does not ask for any liberty of the Press. It seems to have taken as much of that as it wanted.

The rapid extension of steam power is well illustrated in figures lately published concerning European coal production. In the year 1850, Europe was estimated to consume 1,300,000,000 centners of coal. (The centner being 110½ pounds.) In 1867 the consumption was reckoned at 3,000,000,000 centners—or more than double the former quantity. During this time, while the countries stood, in order of production, England, Belgium, France, Germany, the only one that has held its own is England, (which still stands at the head with 2,000,000,000 centners,) and Germany, (which from being last stands second with 480,000,000 centners.) Germany is rapidly striding forward in all material industries; and in coal, while she cannot compete with England in the North Sea and Baltic regions, she still finds large foreign markets in Russia, France, Switzerland, Holland and Belgium. Her coal fields are not by any means worked up to their full extent, and when the famous collapse of the English collieries comes about, of which her croakers are prating, North Germany may be ready to take her place.

The Pall Mall Gazette in noting the presence of a considerable Mormon community in London, with little emigration, puts on a mock alarm, saying: "If this goes on much longer we shall have American travelers filling books with the most harrowing accounts of the profligacy of our social life, and the wondrous development of our religious character." It then asks why the American journals have "overlooked this most promising field?" The answer is simple. American journals aim to be news papers; and the profligacy of London life is a very old story.

In reference to the appointment of female doctors as examining physicians for insurance companies, an exchange asks: "Why not a woman examine a man for insurance, as well as a man examine a woman. Why not?" Chiefly because a woman is not a man, and a man is not a woman.

A number of good ladies of Rochester have been trying for some time to establish a scheme for the reform of the Magdalens of that city. At their last meeting it was proposed to take severe measures for the social punishment of libertines, when one of the ladies mentioned a case within her knowledge in which a young man of the place received a letter from a young lady who professed great admiration for him, and solicited an interview. Subsequently it was discovered that the young lady moved in the first circles of Rochester society, "and ladies," said the speaker, "you all know her father and mother." It does not appear from anything said by the narrator of this story that the young lady in question had any criminal intent, or that she was guilty of anything beyond a great and dangerous indiscretion. The reformers should not be discouraged by such an exceptional incident.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

City Notes of the Week.

Playgoers who have made it their duty to attend first nights at all places of amusement will this week find one house less upon their list, which, spite of the disappearance of one name, is still almost as long as Leporello's. The Broadway Theatre—that will be remembered as having had the elder WALLACK, CHARLES KEAN and EDWIN FORREST among its notable tenants—faded out of existence Wednesday. We use the expression advisedly, for it had long been in the sere and yellow leaf of a not unfortunate life. Now its actors are scattered, its musicians are dispersed and its genial manager, freed from the cares of lesseeship, rests upon laurels that lose none of their value from being pretty well gilded. The critical spectator may miss some of the artistes—a few were possessed of positive merit—but they will certainly not regret any of their less prominent but at least equally boisterous associates, who sat before them and with speculation in their eyes and very little delicacy in their ears, accompanied with equal sentiment the occasional reading of a sad stage letter and the frequent climaxes of a sensational melodrama. The orchestra of the Broadway Theatre was the noisiest of the many organizations of the kind with which local play-houses are gifted. Crescendo movements were not to be executed and diminuendos were wholly ignored. The fortissimo ruled in all its glory. It would be impossible to calculate the waste of physical force effected in one single evening. The shouted wishes of the Irish peasants whose presence before the footlights of the Broadway always proved attractive and was, per consequence, often secured—their wishes, we say, addressed to the ragged fiddlers, and favoring "power to their elbow," seemed to have had a permanent effect upon the genuine and civilized virtuosi attired in less picturesque but more comfortable garb. TALLEYRAND'S caution as to the impolicy of an excess of zeal, was never thought of by these worthy persons. During long intermissions there was rarely one oasis of silence in a howling wilderness of sound. Hence the impossibility for spectators to converse, and the frequent exchanges of criticism while the acting progressed, in perfect, though not altogether inexcusable, disregard of actors and audience. The same effects, we may observe, are still produced by similar causes elsewhere, but the good intentions of the orchestra of the theatre we refer to, and their unhappy results—we believe that in dwelling upon them we but express the views of a large portion of the public—called for especial comment that may serve to lessen the evil at still extant places of resort. Aside from the disappearance of the Broadway, which merited, of course, some record, last week was not an eventful one. Its most memorable incident was afforded by the production of the "Messe Solennelle" at the Academy, where it was listened to twice by a very numerous audience. The subject needs no elaborate reference here. The last performance of the work we should note, however, may be attended at Steinway Hall this evening. Miss KELLOGG, Mme. TESTA, and Signori ANTONUCCI and BOETTI will, as heretofore, take part in its execution, as will also the grand orchestra under Mr. MARETZEK. We are requested to remind the reader that seats for the occasion may be secured at Steinway Hall throughout the day. At the other houses, no novelties of moment was enacted. The pantomime at the Tammany has proved more popular than was anticipated after its first representation Monday, and—we may commence here our usual announcements—remains as the principal attraction at that establishment until further notice. A very cultured musician, Signor OFERTI, has supplied it with original and selected music worthy of accompanying a representation appealing to a higher taste. At the Waverley too, "Paris; or, the Judgment," the piece first played last week, is maintained as the most substantial element of an agreeable entertainment. "The Tempest," at the Grand Opera House, to deal with more pretentious temples of the muse, subsides after Saturday next. "Caste" is to be produced at Wallack's to-morrow. "Othello" will be played at Booth's. At the Fifth Avenue Theatre, a different opera will be sung on each night, the production of "Les Dragons de Villars" having been postponed, sharing, in this respect, the lot of the new pantomime at Wood's, the earliest presentation of which has been deferred un til Thursday. At Niblo's and at the Olympic, no change of bill is to be recorded. The Bowery is widowed of its "Seven Dwarfs," and several new pieces are substituted for the fairy spectacle. The San Francisco Minstrels—masters of all they survey—hold their usual levees. And with the reminder that Professor RISLEY'S Japanese artists still offer their curious exhibition at the New-York Circus, the task of scanning the dramatic horizon can be regarded as achieved.

The Stage Abroad.

The dimensions and some features of the interior of the new opera house in the London Haymarket are thus described. From the foot-lights to the front of the boxes is a length of sixty-three feet; and from the footlights to the wall at the back of the stage sixty feet. The width of the stage, including the "scene dock" at its eastern end, is ninety feet; the painting-room being over it, so that the scenery, when completed, can be lowered down the "cut" into the dock, ready for immediate use on the stage. The width of the proscenium opening is forty feet, and its height thirty-five feet. The width across from the box fronts is fifty-six feet; with twelve feet depth to the front and seven feet to the side boxes. The height of the auditorium, from the floor of the pit to the ceiling, is sixty-five feet. The height of the stage, from floor to roof, is seventy feet, and twenty-three feet the depth below the stage, including the "mezzanine." No "flats," i. e., scenes, divided in halves and pushed on from opposite sides of the stage to join—and ocasionally failing to join—in the centre, will be used; but all the scenery will drop from above or rise from below the horizon of the spectator; all the working of the scenes being effected by means of the "gridiron" above the flies, or in the "mezzanine" below.

Mr. CHARLES MATHEWS recently performed at the Alnwick (England) Theatre, and the house was crowded in every part. In the interval between the pieces a young man named ROBERT TURNER attempted to pass over from the gallery and to enter the side boxes, but GEORGE CRASTER, a man employed for the purpose of keeping order, interfered. A struggle took place, and both men fell into the boxes, CRASTER undermost, with his arms around TURNER'S neck. CRASTER managed to rise, but TURNER was unable to move, and was carried home, where he died shortly afterward. CRASTER was immediately apprehended, and charged with having caused the death of TURNER.

Old London playgoers, says the Pall Mall Gazette, will remember the days when the attraction of Sadler's Wells Theatre chiefly depended on dramas in which the grand feature was the employment of real water, not only in cascades such as we often see on the stage of the present, but for the purpose of representing a spacious river, or even a sea. In this flood, created by pipes communicating with the New River, huge ships could float, and it is recorded that a mimic Battle of the Nile was in the time of NELSON fought upon its surface. Sometimes, when a domestic interest was intended, an artist, biped or quadruped, would jump into the water, and at once display a talent for natation, and further the ends of dramatic justice. The profanum vulgus applauded, but in the eyes of the judicious few this primitive form of ultra-realism completely defeated its own object; for, though the means employed were severely natural, the effect was far less so than would have been produced by the worst possible picture by the worst possible wielder of the brush, the boundless sea as represented at Clerkenwell looking like nothing on earth but a huge dismal cistern. If we are correctly informed, they will do things better at Munich, where in the course of a grand spectacle called "Rheingold," (now in rehearsal,) the waters of the Rhine will be seen undulating round a rock, and will be crossed by a swimming nymph. About the swimming nymph we have no doubt, and we accept the fact that one Mlle. MALLINGER is taking lessons in natatory art to qualify herself for her important part.

Dr. MARCET, of the Brompton, England Consumption Hospital, has been looking down the throat of one of the Tyrolese singers who lately warbled at St. James' Hall, the object of the inspection being to ascertain the physiological conditions which produce the beautiful falsetto notes for which the Swiss artists are celebrated. The observations were made by means of a laryngoscope, a little instrument whereof the principal member is a mirror placed at the back of the patient's mouth. It is pretty, generally known that the human vocal apparatus consists of a pair of membranes situated horizontally in the throat, and just touching at their edges. A drum-head, with a slit across it, may convey a popular idea of them. In the act of singing the lips of these cords, as they are called, are brought into contact, and they approach each other throughout their whole length and remain parallel. When they are set in vibration, by the passage of air through them, under these the ordinary conditions, a full chest note is emitted; but if they do not meet in their entire length, either a posterior or anterior portion of them remaining apart, the sound is no longer full, but feeble and shrill; the note emitted is what the stringed instrument player calls a harmonic, and what the singer calls a falsetto, or head note. The violinist who would bring out a harmonic so touches a string, that, instead of making it vibrate as a whole, he divides it into segments, each of which vibrates by itself, and emits the note due to its short length, instead of that which the full length of the string would yield. The same sort of thing appears to be done by the falsetto singer; the adept can at will shorten his vocal cords so as to pass instantly from any note to its harmonic. The muscular process by which this transition is effected is not clearly made out, so that it cannot be determined whether all singers are alike gifted with powers of head-singing equal to the Tyrolese, or whether Alpine melody grew out of peculiar capabilities of Alpine throats.

M. VICTORIEN SARDOU has refused permission to the managers of country theatres to play his new drama of "Patrie." He reserves for the company of the Porte St. Martin, which purposes taking a Summer tour through Belgium and the Provinces, the right of performance. This course, though not uncommon in England, is novel in France, and is not very favorably received by the Press, which points out that, if universally adopted, it would be ruinous to the country theatres.

One of the musical journals of Paris makes an announcement with reference to a young American lady, who is at present under the tuition of M. WARTEL, the professor who enjoys the honor of having trained Mlle. NILSSON, the first cantatrice of the day. The young lady is described as 14½ years old, and as having been introduced to M. WARTEL by Mr. BENEDICT. She is named VIOLETTA COLVILLE. "WARTEL," says our contemporary, "speaks of her with the enthusiasm of a true artist, and with the competent appreciation of a professor who thoroughly understands that of which he speaks. 'It is a Malibran I shall produce,' he cries. 'She has the sacred fire, She always overcomes me. She apprehends too quickly. She has the most beautiful musical organization I ever met with in my life. I shall bring her out at eighteen, and I only ask Providence to bless me with life till then. In three years we shall have a Malibran.'" Miss VIOLETTE COLVILLE is, we believe, the neice and adopted daughter of Miss MARY PROVOST, an American artiste whose name is familiar to the playgoers of both worlds.

A fallen woman is the general subject now-a-day on the French stage. The Académie du Gard, France, has given this as a subject for an essay in 1870: "To appreciate the value of such a subject is suited to the dramatic art. To seek the causes and to study the literary and moral consequences of its being so constantly employed. To examine particularly the nature and the effect of the prestige with which authors are apt to surround a fallen woman." The Academy will only receive essays in prose.

The Venice journals announce the death in that city of M. DREYSCHOK, the celebrated pianist. He was born in 1818, at Zack, in Bohemia, and had for several years filled the post of director of the Conservatoire of Music at St. Petersburgh.

WAGNER'S NEW OPERA.

The only event of moment in foreign musical and theatrical circles seems to be the production, in Paris of Herr RICHARD WAGNER'S "Rienzi." It is impossible, as yet, to secure a sober criticism upon the merits of the opera, which was written by the composer some years ago. An amusing, and judging from the brief accounts in other papers, a tolerably just record of the impression made upon the critics by the earliest performance of the opera is, however, to be found in Galignani's Messenger. "The writer of 'Rienzi,'" says the journalist, "was essentially a snob." When the parvenu was arrivé, the plebeian affected the patrician, the Tribune of the people went in for the Divus Tiberius, the Democrat set up as a Cæsar, the demagogue flared in purple, bade monarchs kiss the hem of his garment—of that imperial chamvde which he wore in state processions. For this the mediæval Italian tragicades was wont to appear in public with the imperial insignia, sceptre, globe, and all the trash and tinsel of state. This Spartan, stoic, Republican, convoked all the feudal barons of Italy, and the high dignitaries of State to his investiture with the order of the Holy Ghost; and mediæval historians have depicted the grotesque ceremony, just as you see the magnificent bashaw in the gallery at Versailles in his full-bottomed wig, placing the Saint Esprit on the neck of his servant Regent, who receives it with that 'Ne me faites pas rire' air of TALLEYRAND when he performed high mass. The rabid republican, instead of donning the lion's hide, should have hung a calf's skin on his recreant limbs. Lord LYTTON has expended much poetical power in his unfinished translation of RIENZI, but the man was essentially one who carried gewgaws jingling about his person, which made him an object of ridicule rather than of respect. Lord LYTTON and Herr WAGNER could not then have selected a more uninteresting personage from the page of history for their hero; and the German discomposer could not have chosen a more inefficient collaborateur than the person who has written the libretto, which is but one continued round of street fights between plebeians and patricians; and on this account the most favorable love episode has been unskillfully embroidered. We feel a great hesitation to speak about the opera itself—a disagreeable duty; but let us at once confess that it produced upon us the same effect as the conviction of the gentle Desdemona's indelicate quean the Moor—we thought that change had come again. Lotharios who have carried on clandestine correspondence through the Post Office may have made personal pilgrimages to that establishment in search of initialed letters from the mysterious fair; they may have passed through that ring of iron, one of the few which have escaped Baron HAUSSMANN'S avenging pickaxes, the Rue Pagevin, sacred to chaudronniers, who hang upon copper marmites as remorselessly as on the tympanum; the whole of the dark narrow space is sacred to copper saucepans, and the vintage is enough to distract the least sensitive of mortals. Should Herr WAGNER come to Paris, he should take up his abode there, for there would he find full sources of inspiration. He seems to have taken Pandora's casket and made it into a musical box, leaving, however, hope at the bottom—for 'the music of the future.' Vulcan is the god of his idolatry, and he seems to worship the clang of the hammer on the anvil. Confusion was confounded in 'Lohengrin' and 'Tannhauser,' and fails to find her way out of the labyrinth in 'Rienzi.' Have you ever been staying in a chateau in Normandy when a widow in the neighboring village takes unto her bosom a second or a third or fourth husband, beiore the expiration of the year's mourning for her late lord? The custom perhaps prevails in other provinces also, but in Normandy the peasantry congregate under the windows of the newly-wedded widow, with tongs, shovels, saucepans, horns, toy trumpets and other instruments deemed torture by tympanum, and give the full swing to their discordant chorus in a charivari. Were such a concert to fall upon WAGNER'S ear the strains would lap him in Elysium. He tunes his lute to its clang, but ever and anon, when the distraught senses are maddened by this confusion, he takes the tempest-tossed soul, and lays it up in a haven of exquisite melody. ROSSINI himself would have tempered his sarcastic smile could he have listened to the chorus of the white-robed virgins, who are sent forth as doves from the ark, to bear the glad tidings of peace and goodwill from Rome toward the nations of the earth, which had been preceded by a fine chorus, accompanied by the clash of contending falchions. Another fine melody is dovetailed into the incoherent discordancies of the third act; and in the fourth, the priestly malediction, culminating in the excommunication of the Tribune, is extremely grand—grand as when the hills shake with their mountain-mirth, when the live thunder leaps from crag to crag, and Jura answers through her misty shroud back to the joyous Alps, which call to her aloud. And while the Guelfs were disputing with the Ghibelines on the stage, the Wagnerites were squabbling in the stalls with the unbelievers in these prophetic greetings of the weird Muse. The mighty noise of hot contention and Wagnerian clangor shakes the winged statue on its pedestal in the Place du Chatelet. Curiosity drives, however, a compact crowd there every night, and some few converts, who went to scoff, remain to pray; but WAGNER will not go down to Paris. Nor can he be forced down our throats against the stomach of our sense, either by M. PASDELOUP or by any other manager. This incoherent composer was very angry with the Parisians for their disbelief in 'Tannhauser'—he will never forgive them for this—but he is unyielding. Thanks be to M. PASDELOUP for having given us an opportunity of listening once more to this strange music. The opera is put upon the stage in sumptuous attire. MONTJAUZE is admirable, and gives proofs of hitherto unsuspected abilities. The other members of the troupe have also done their best; but 'Rienzi' will not succeed; nor will M. WAGNER be able to make the Parisians believe in him."

The Elections in Virginia.

From the Richmond Dispatch, April 30.

General CANBY expresses the opinion that the elections cannot take place earlier than about the 1st of July. The registration will occupy much time, and make it impossible to take the vote earlier than the middle of June; but that being in the midst of harvest, it would be out of the question to fix it for that time. Therefore no day earlier than the 1st of July can be named.

Ex-Secretary Seward's Visit to California.

From the San Francisco Bulletin, April 17.

It has been stated that Secretary SEWARD intended visiting California, and a letter addressed by him to a friend in this city confirms the statement. In that letter, under date of Auburn, March 30, Mr. SEWARD says:

"You are quite right in thinking that I hope to visit that coast (the Pacific) this Summer. I wish to examine personally the region which has been, at arm's length, one of my chief studies while in public life."

The distinguished Ex-Secretary would be greeted here with peculiar respect and esteem, by people of all classes and opinions. For twenty years he has been, both in the Senate and Cabinet, a zealous friend of the interests of California and of the Pacific coast generally. He labored to secure the early admission of the State, and was a warm advocate of the Pacific Railroad when some of our own Representatives pursued a tortuous course on that subject.

Mr. Ford, of the British Legation, and Mr. Garcia, of the Peruvian Legation, are at the Clarendon Hotel. Hon. D. C. Littlejohn, of Buffalo, Hon. H. R. Low, of Monticello, and Hon. Ben. ### Reception of the Prince of Orange Lodge.

The members of the Prince of Orange Lodge F. and A. M. gave a reception last evening on the occasion of the opening of their new lodge-room in Booth's Theatre Building, corner Sixth-avenue and Twenty-third-street. The room, with its rich and tasteful furniture and adornments, has been already fully described. In addition to the prismatic Govern the Master's chair, there was noticeable over the Senior Warden's chair a level, over that of the Junior Warden a plumb, and in the centre of the room a large basket with the letters "P. of O. L. No. 16," all elegantly wrought in natural flowers. Notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather the friends of the members to the number of several hundred ladies and gentlemen assembled in response to their invitation.

Bunstein's Band discoursed music for the company, and from 9 o'clock until 11:30 the time was most agreeably passed in promenading and dancing. Ample refreshments had been provided, and at a late hour all dispersed highly pleased with the social entertainment. Unusual with the Masonic Order, the Prince of Orange Lodge is limited to 100 members. The following are the names of the officers: E. E. Thorne, Master; T. B. Clarkson, Senior Warden; G. A. Slocum, Junior Warden; S. H. Tyng, Jr., Chaplain; A. P. Puffer, Senior Deacon; H. E. Davies, Jr., Junior Deacon; George Sands, Treasurer; A. S. Gardner, Secretary; Mr. Ames, Marshal, and Richard England, Tiler.

The Hoboken Malpractice Case.

Yesterday afternoon Mr. HOFFMAN, counsel for Drs. BLANK and VOELKNER, now awaiting the action of the Grand Jury in the recent Hoboken malpractice case, applied to Hon. Judge BEDLE for a writ of habeas corpus. The application is under consideration and will be acted upon on Monday.

The Widening of Fifth-avenue.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

The more I examine the matter of the widening of Fifth-avenue, between Fifty-eighth and Fifty-ninth streets, the more objectionable does the project appear. Have the public, or the parties assessed for this improvement, examined into this project? If they have not, the sooner they do so the better. It is proposed to widen Fifth-avenue, between Fifty-eighth and Fifty-ninth streets, by taking off the west front 200 feet, and to make an additional public opening of 200 feet square at the Park entrance.

The centre of this plot is to be a miniature park with a fountain or statue in the centre, so that carriages and equestrians, instead of passing, as they do now, direct from the Park to the Fifth-avenue, will turn two corners along the new street before they get into the Fifth-avenue, thus rendering a jam or block at the Park entrance more likely than now. For what possible purpose was this project got up? Was it to put a green square and a fountain or statue upon and outside of the Park, and for this puerile purpose to pay $600,000, including $100,000 of expenses for a small piece of the most expensive land in the City? Has not the Central Park already cost enough? It would be interesting to know who recommended this project. Are the Central Park Commissioners in favor of it? Are they so reckless of expense to the City, and so regardless of the interests of individuals, as to favor so small and useless an addition to the Park at such a cost to private parties no way benefited. I do not believe it.

Let the public look into this. Remonstrances must be filed by the 4th of May inst., at the office of ROBERT C. HUTCHINGS, Esq., No. 32 Chambers-street, one of the Commissioners. Let every one opposed to the scheme aid the parties now engaged in opposing it and send their remonstrances there by that time.

SATURDAY, May 1—P. M.

The month opens on a generally strong and buoyant market for the Public Funds, which are favored by the very light offerings, the growing supply of money at the business centres, and the encouraging gain of the revenues on the expenses of the Government, enabling the Treasury Department to make a further reduction of nearly six and a half millions, in the aggregate of the national indebtedness, since April 1, according to the telegraphic advices from Washington. The latest dealings were at the highest figures of the day. The 1862 Five-twenties closed at 118⅝ bid, xe the 3 ₱ cent. May gold coupon, which is equal to fully 122⅜ coupon included. The 1867s were in request at 116¾, and the Ten-forties at 108⅝.

The day's business at the office of the United States Assistant Treasurer was as follows: Total receipts, $1,869,332 48; total payments, $3,638,718 82; balance, $81,985,389 15. The receipts include, for Customs, $394,000 ; for Gold Notes, $650,000.

Gold ranged from 134¼ to 135 on a more spirited speculation, leaving off steadily at 134¾ @134⅞. The French steamer took out $73,405 in specie, making the total exports for the week $569,289. The Alaska arrived to-day with a California treasure freight of $690,948. Government disbursed through the Sub-Treasury to-day $3,230,768 of coin interest, making a total for the week of $4,722,610. The coin income of the Government from Customs at this port during the week has been $2,241,519.

There has been rather more animation in the Money, chiefly in the late afternoon, when the prevailing rate on call was 7 ₱ cent. The bank return showed a further important gain of strength, as the result of the week's business, including an increase of $6,608,485 in the deposits, $2,517,824 in the legal tender reserve, and $417,257 in the specie item. The loans have been augmented $2,977,086. The circulation has been reduced $88,523.

There were less extensive dealings in the Railway and Miscellaneous Share line; yet, with exceptionally severe depression in Erie, the changes in values were not remarkably important. Pacific Mail was weak. Reading was adversely affected by rumors of a strike in the Scranton Coal region. Ohio Certificates yielded a little. Most other values were strong and buoyant. The later transactions indicated a firmer tone in the general market, aided by the favorable bank exhibit.

The imports, (other than dry goods and specie,) at the Port of New-York from foreign ports for the week ending April 30, 1869, were $7,823,485.

The Philadelphia North American, of this morning, says:

The market is in a very unsettled condition. Between rumors and counter rumors of strikes, the Scranton sale and the advance of tolls on the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad, it is almost impossible to state the exact tone of the trade. The new rates of drawbacks are an average decrease of about 25 cents per ton, and the prices realized at the Scranton sale on the 28th ult., 20 cents advance over the previous one, and about the current market figures. There was a decided falling off in the demand in the early part of the week, but during the last day or two it has become stronger, with an evident desire on the part of the purchasers to obtain prompt shipments. This change is partly owing to a feeling that the general cessation of work will take place on the 8th inst., but the great anxiety for immediate shipment is caused by the change in tolls. There can be nothing definitely said of the coming period of suspension, nor of the positive power of the Miners' Union, but it is almost certain that its strength will be tested this month. If the combination wields the immense influence with the men which it is asserted it does, the production will undoubtedly be curtailed and prices kept at remunerative rates. A stoppage will no doubt take place at no very distant day; whether it will be solely caused by the laborers or by the condition of the market remains to be proved. Telegrams were received late yesterday afternoon, stating that the 8th inst. had been positively fixed by the men for a general suspension, and many parties here consider them reliable. The drawbacks on all shipments of anthracite coal from Port Richmond, on and after the 3d instant, to all points east of New-Brunswick and south of Cape Henry will be as follows until further notice:

Messrs. JOHN BINGHAM & Co., in their Liverpool circular of April 16, say:

"The weather has been warm and summer-like, and although the supplies of English Wheat at the country markets held this week have been small, prices have given way 1s.@2s. ₱ quarter, without leading to any marked improvement in the demand. The number of Grain cargoes on passage to ports of call in the United Kingdom, according to last return, was as follows: 84 cargoes Wheat, 55 cargoes Maize, and 24 cargoes Barley; same time last year 232 cargoes Wheat, 35 cargoes Maize, and 17 cargoes Barley. There are now on the coast for sale 10 cargoes of Wheat, 13 cargoes of Maize and 15 cargoes of Barley, and the sales, C. F. & I., reported since our last are, 2 cargoes of American Spring Wheat, arrived, at 42s.@43s. 3d. ₱ 480 lbs.; 3 cargoes Black Sea Wheat, arrived, at 42s.@46s. 6d. ₱ 492 lbs.; 4 cargoes Mediterranean Wheat, arrived, at 41s. 6d.@46s. ₱ 492 lbs.; 5,000 quarters Black Sea Wheat, shipping, at 41s. 6d. ₱ 492 lbs.; 3 cargoes Mediterranenn Maize, arrived, at 28s. 9d. ₱ 480 lbs., and 28s. 6d. ₱ 492 lbs.; one cargo Black Sea Maize, arrived, at 28s. 6d. ₱ 492 lbs.; 4,000 quarters Danat Maize, to Trieste, shipping, at 28s. 6d. ₱ 480 lbs.; 5,500 quarters Danubian Maize, on passage, at 30s. ₱ 492 lbs. At our last Tuesday's market, Wheat lost the improvement of the previous Friday, say 2d.@3d. on White, and 1d. ₱ cental on Red. Flour was also the turn lower. Indian Corn—White was unaltered in value, but other sorts were 6d. ₱ quarter cheaper. Oats and Oatmeal were unchanged in value. Beans were 6d.@1s., and Peas 6d. ₱ quarter lower. Dari—A lot was forced off at 21s. ₱ quarter. At our Corn Exchange to-day, Wheat sold slowly at 1d.@2d. ₱ cental under the rates of Tuesday last. Flour was also easier to buy, and slow of sale. Indian Corn met a fair demand at a reduction of 1s. on Mixed and round Yellow, and 6d. ₱ quarter on White. Oats and Oatmeal were nominally unaltered in value; demand slack. Beans were 6d.@1s. ₱ quarter cheaper. Peas in retail demand at late prices. Dari neglected; prices nominal. Millet Seed offered at 22s. ₱ quarter."

Of the Tobacco trade in New-York, in April, Messrs. M. RADER & SON remark as follows:

"We have to record a very active business in Kentucky Tobacco during last month. The demand was general, receiving considerable impetus by parties entering the market early to fill contract orders. The sales come up to 6,000 hhds., of which about 1,500 hhds, including resales, consisting of old stocks, were taken for consumption at 10c.@14c.; the balance for export chiefly for France, Spain, Bremen, Antwerp, Coast of Africa and some dry parcels for England. Prices ruled very steady; the demand for low grades being very strong; holders of late are trying for an advance, obtained it in some instances, but there is a general impression that with continued heavy receipts they will have to be modified again. For good and fine Leaf, (heavy as well as light,) there is but a moderate inquiry, and stocks already accumulating. With moderate prices, the prospects are quite favorable for a steady and healthy business throughout the season, but it behooves our Western friends to act with caution and moderation. We quote: Common Lugs, 5c.@5¼c.; Good Lugs, 6c.@6½c.; Common Leaf, 7¼c.@8c.; Medium Leaf, 9c.@12c.; Good Leaf, 11c.@13¼c.; Fine Leaf, 13c.@15c.; Selections, 14½c.@16c. ₱ lb. Seedleaf Tobacco—There was considerable activity in this article until the latter part of the month, when business dropped off very suddenly, and the month closed on a very dull market. In Connecticut, the principal inquiry was for old crop—1865 and 1866—which was freely offered, but the most of for home trade, they being the only sorts left which could be obtained at reasonable figures. State Seedleaf has moved quite freely during the month, and in bond, the continued demand for fillers and low grades having stimulated the movement. Pennsylvania and Ohio were comparatively quiet, the small stocks left of these growths offering very little choice, and the new crops there has been a fair business done, mostly of Ohio—part for export and part for home trade—the quality of this crop being thought by some to be equal to Connecticut, of which latter crop some few sales of fillers and seconds were effected at high rates. In the wrapper way little has taken place here, although we hear of sales made in the country at such high prices that we think it will restrict transactions until late in the season. There have been a few sales made of State, principally for shipping, this being the cheapest sort of the new crops. Pennsylvania remains quiet. The rates asked for new crop Connecticut running lot, is from 30c. to 40c.; for new crop Ohio and Pennsylvania, 20c. to 25c.; New-York State from 15c. to 20c. The sales are, 900 cases old Connecticut, 8c., 14c., 15c., 18c., 20½c., 22c., 45c.; 350 cases new Connecticut, 11c., 13c., 23c.; 300 cases old State, 7¾c., 9¾c., 15c.; 300 cases new state, 7¾c., 14c.; 250 cases old Pennsylvania, 9¼c., 11¾c., 13½c.; 50 cases old Ohio, 11¾c., 13c., 16c.; 1,575 cases new Ohio, 13c., 14½c., 15c., 18½c., 20c., 23c. We quote old crop as follows: Connecticut and Massachusetts Fillers, 8c.@12¾c.; Wrappers lots, 18c.@45c.; Fine Wrappers, 50c.@75c.; New-York State Fillers, 7½c.@9c.; average lots, 12c.@22c.; Wrappers, 15c.@40c.; Pennsylvania and Ohio Fillers, 7¾c.@8c.; average lots, 12c.@20c.; Wrappers, 12¾c.@35c. Havana Tobacco—Although the transactions in this article are not quite heavy, still prices remain the same, contrary to general expectations, and in some cases holders had to make some slight concession to effect sales. With a revival of our manufacturing interests we think prices will be fully maintained, unless the end of the civil strife on the Island should be near, when, no doubt, prices would recede. The sales are 5,000 bales for consumption, 600 for export, at from $20 to $30 in gold, in bond. 600 were shipped direct. Yara Tobacco—A fair demand existed during the beginning of the month, when some 400 bales were sold at 30c.@32½c. for average lots; but latterly the inquiry has fallen off, and the market closes dull. We quote as follows: Havana—Common, 82½c.@85c.; Good, 86c.@1; Fine, $1 05¾@$1 10. Yara—Cut, 25c.@80c.; II cut, $1 02½@$1 08; average lot, 85c.@92½c.; Manufactured Tobacco continued in good request for black work in keeping condition, at prices fully equal to former quotations. Bright work, however, is still of slow sale and without advanced value. Some arrivals of new stock have been offered on the market; but the generally doubtful condition for shipping purposes precludes any sales of consequence. Toward the close of the month the business has been exceedingly inactive, which can be relieved only by additions to the stock on the market of desirable manufactured goods: Black work, Common and Medium, 15c.@18c., in bond; Black work, Good and Fine, 20c.@30c., in bond; Bright work, Common and Medium, 15c.@20c., in bond; Bright work, Good and Fine, 30c.@50c.

LAW REPORTS.

SUPREME COURT—CHAMBERS—MAY 1.

The People ex rel. Gilbert vs. The Lady Superior of the House of the Good Shepherd.—This matter, which, during the past year, has frequently occupied the attention of the Court, is again the subject of decision. The circumstances of the case are briefly as follows: Mary Ann Smith was placed by her father in charge of the Sisters having control of the House of the Good Shepherd, for the purpose of reformation, he asserting that she was induced to lead a dissolute life. It was claimed by the relator, Gilbert, that, admitting the girl to have been guilty of some mere indiscretions of youth, she had subsequently been converted, renounced the Catholic faith and became an approved member of the Protestant Church; and that the restraint was not in consequence of immoral habits, but as a punishment for or restraint from association with a Protestant denomination.

Judge SUTHERLAND denied the application on the ground that in the affidavit before him he could discover no improper motive in the father's action by which she was placed where she is. From this decision appeal was taken to the General Term, and on argument, affidavits were read tending to contradict the evidence of some of the witnesses on behalf of the respondents, and the General Term, while sustaining the decision of Judge SUTHERLAND on the affidavits before him, directs that, in view of subsequent testimony, the hearing on the motion at Chambers be reopened.

Judge SUTHERLAND now holds, in reference to that decision, that a decision or judgment in a matter of habeas corpus is appealable; that while the additional affidavits were properly considered by the General Term in forming their judgment as to a rehearing, yet they cannot be properly before him, having been taken before an officer in another State, and that the proper course is for the relator to take out a new writ, if he desires to avail himself of any new testimony, and continue

United States of Colombia—The Cushing Canal Treaty—The Candidacy of Ex-President Mosquera—Destruction of the Steamship North America by Fire—Miscellaneous Intelligence.

From Our Own Correspondent.

PANAMA, Friday, April 23, 1869.

We have dates from Bogota to the 3d inst. Some reaction in feeling in regard to the Cushing canal treaty had taken place in Bogota, caused principally by the apprehension that in case the National Government did not ratify it the State of Panama might secede and take the matter into its own hands. So a petition was sent up from the House of Representatives to the Senate for that body to reconsider its vote. It was reported in Santa Martha, however, that the Senate refused to reconsider. It is not impossible that the treaty, in a modified form, may yet be ratified.

On the 19th ult., Her Britannic Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires laid before the Senate at Bogota the proposition of an English company for the construction of an interoceanic canal. It was referred to a committee of three Senators.

A committee of the House of Representatives recommended to the House the adoption of a resolution to indict the President of the Republic, with four of his Cabinet, before the Senate, upon eight articles of indictment.

The friends of Ex-President MOSQUERA are actively at work to restore him to his country from his exile in Peru, and to make him President of the Republic for the ensuing term. If they cannot succeed legally, they seem determined to try revolution. It is currently reported and believed at Bagota that a league exists between a portion of the Liberal party wedded to MOSQUERA and many influential Conservatives to separate the States of Bolivar, Antigua, Tolima, Cauca and Panama from the Republic, and to form an independent government from them. The Republic now consists of nine States.

The North American Steamship Company's steamer America, which left Panama for San Francisco on the 3d, was totally consumed by fire in the port of San Juan del Sur on the 11th inst. She reached San Juan on the 7th, to take in coals and to pick up material in that port belonging to the Company. Preparations for coaling were completed, but no coal had been received on board. At about 5:35 A. M. on the 11th, shortly after the watch had been called, an alarm of fire was given by the Engineer's watchmen, the ship's bell was rung and all hands were instantly engaged combating the flames, some with buckets and others at the forward pumps. Yet notwithstanding every exertion was made to stop its progress, it was found impossible to do so, and in less than fifteen minutes from the time the alarm was given the steamer became one mass of flames, both fore and aft, and burning with fearful rapidity. The Captain, officers and crew had not time to save the whole of their effects, and there was barely time to lower the two forward boats in which to escape. The origin of the fire is not known. It is supposed it commenced in the Porter's room and burst out simultaneously into the engine room; still it is positively certain that no lights had been in either room during the night. There was a fresh breeze blowing at the time off the land, and Captain BLETHEN was on deck several times between the hours of from 2 to 4 A. M., and spoke to the deck watchman; nothing to indicate a fire was noticed, and its breaking out must have been instantaneous. At 2:10 P. M. the wreck disappeared and sunk in six fathoms. The French steam frigate Duchayla saw the illumination some distance at sea, steered towards it, and arrived off the bay at about 11 A. M. The Captain very promptly sent off a boat to render assistance, but nothing could be done for the vessel; he agreed, however, to wait until 3 P. M., and take the officers and crew to Panama, at which hour the whole of them embarked on board his frigate, and were treated in the kindest and most hospitable manner until reaching Puntarenas, where they were transferred to the steamer Guatemala, for Panama. The United States Consul sent them to San Francisco. The America was an old vessel and was probably not insured. She was formerly called the Coatzacoalcos, and ran on the Canada lakes.

The schooner Edwin Watson, of New-York, was totally lost on the 14th ultimo, near Cartbagena, together with most of her cargo. She struck a rock and stove a hole in her bottom. Her cargo consisted of forty tons coffee, 3,000 hides, balsam, &c., and was valued at $50,000. Some sails, heavy rigging, chains and anchors were recovered, and have gone to New-York on the Fanny Elder. The vessel was four years old, and valued at $20,000; no insurance.

The fine steamers of the Royal Mail Steamship Company, between Aspinwall, St. Thomas and Southampton, will in future touch at Cherbourg, France, to land and take in passengers. The price of first-class passage is to be reduced on these steamers.

We have no United States war vessel in Panama. The gunboat Gettysburg is still at Aspinwall.

South America—Chilian News—The Arauca Indians—Yellow Fever Ravages—Ecuador Intelligence.

From Our Own Correspondent.

PANAMA, Friday, April 23.

We have dates from Valparaiso and Santiago de Chile to the 3d, and from Callao and Lima to the 14th instant.

CHILE.

No quorum had yet been obtained for the extraordinary session of Congress. Don JOAQUIN BLEST GANA, now Minister of Justice, is to go to London as Minister, and Don ALBERTO BLEST GANA, now Minister there, is to go to Washington to settle the Spanish question. Don RAMON LORA, now Intendente of Valparaiso, is to be Minister of Justice, and Don ALEJANDRO REYES is to be Intendente of Valparaiso.

The Indians in Arauca are still very troublesome and expensive to the Government.

The great agricultural exposition had been postponed to the middle of April.

Business was dull in Valparaiso. Cotton stuffs and sugars were rising in price. Wheat is lower, notwithstanding the prospect of a poor harvest.

A very rich silver mine, it is reported, has been discovered in the Province of Aconcagua.

There was nothing new from Bolivia, except that the seaport of Cobija had been devastated by yellow fever. Those who had not died had fled into the interior, abandoning their stores and dwellings in dismay.

PERU.

The yellow fever has committed frightful ravages at Tacna, Arica, Iquique and other places on the south coast. A correspondent says:

"News from Tacna is of the most harrowing character. The mortality from yellow fever, from the 17th of February to March 31, was from 1,200 to 1,400 persons. The population of Tacna, which was over 9,000 souls, has been reduced to 2,000. From 5,000 to 6,000 have fled to the interior. At last accounts the epidemic was unabated in its fury. The panic was so great that nurses could not be obtained at $25 per day."

In Lima and Callao the yellow fever prevailed, and a good many have died. Señor DOMINGUES, of Chiarini's Circus Company, died of the epidemic at Lima, and three of the troupe were left at Callao sick when the company left for Valparaiso. There were sixty-six fatal cases of yellow fever in Callao in March.

A petition was presented by the resident Americans of the Jewish persuasion of Lima to the Government, through the American Minister, General HOVEY, for permission to purchase a piece of ground for a cemetery, which permission was conceded by the authorities.

On the 18th inst. a smart shock of earthquake was felt at Callao.

On the morning of the 14th inst. an attempt at revolution was made at the port of Santa Catalina by the officers and troops stationed there, but the design of the revolutionists was frustrated by the timely interference of the Government.

The amount of silver bars received in Lima from the mine of Cerro del Pasco, for ten days, was fifty-three, valued at $178,476. An emigration society has made application to the Government for a grant of land on the banks of the River Chaucha, to colonize 3,000 families within three years.

During the passage of the United States steamer Newbern through the Straits of Magellan, Captain FREEMAN, who went on shore, picked up a piece of gold weighing half an ounce.

The American ship Henry B. Wright returned to the port of Callao on the 6th, which she left two days previous freighted with guano, with her crew in a state of mutiny.

The American schooner Shooting Star, bound for San Francisco, put into Callao on the 9th inst. in distress.

ECUADOR.

Don GARCIA MORENO, the Dictator, continues to promulgate his despotic decrees. The sale of the property of all disturbers of the peace is to defray the expenses of military repression. The Press is completely muzzled. No disturbance had taken place since the frightful affair at Guayaquil.

A shock of earthquake was felt almost simultaneously at Quito and Guayaquil on the night of the 19th March. No damage was done.

Central American Countries—Revolutionary Demonstration in Guatemala—The Coffee Crop—Nicaraguan Affairs.

From Our Own Correspondent.

PANAMA, Friday, April 23, 1869.

The Panama Railroad Company's Steamer Guatemala arrived at Panama on the 15th inst. With the exception of the news of the burning of the North American Steamship Company's steamer America, she brings no intelligence of interest.

On the 16th of March Colonel SERAPIO CUEZ undertook to get up a revolution in Guatemala. He invaded the Republic from the Mexican border at the head of only twenty men, but was quickly compelled to recross the frontier by the Government troops.

In Escuintla the yellow fever had carried off many of the people, but the epidemic was disappearing.

In Costa Rica President JOINEREC had established a censorship over the Press, requiring publishers to give bonds in the sum of $3,000 when about to establish a paper.

I notice by the shipping lists that ten or twelve vessels are loading coffee and sugar in the different Central American ports for France, England and Germany. This year it appears that nearly all the Central American exports will go to Europe around Cape Horn. How is it that the United States gets so little of this rich trade, when we have regular steam and railroad communication with all parts of Central America, occupying not over fifteen days, and the voyage around the Horn to Europe occupies six months?

A number of military officers, among whom is General BLANCO, have been dismissed the Costa Rican service.

The coffee crop is nearly all in. First class commands about 9½ cents, American gold, in Punta Arenas.

In Nicaragua some serious charges having been made in and out of Congress against President GUZMAN, he made known his intention to resign; when Congress passed on the 19th of March a resolution approving all his acts and those of his ministers. He nevertheless sent in his resignation in a message terminating with these words: "I am resolved to retain no longer a position wherein I have only reaped deceptions, bitterness and miserable disappointments." Congress returned an answer full of praise and satisfaction, refused to accept the resignation, and amid much apparent rejoicing succeeded in prevailing upon his Excellency to retain power. Congress adjourned on the 22d to meet again on the 1st of January next. The country is at peace. The contract made by Mr. AYON, Minister of Nicaragua at Paris, the 6th of October last, with Monsieur CHEVALIER for the opening of a canal across Nicaragua, had been ratified by the Senate, and Senator MARIANO MONTEALEGRE been appointed Special Envoy to the Republic of Costa Rica, to enter into negotiations in reference to some articles connected with the affair.

THE OCEAN OUTRAGE.

Another Chapter of Brutalities on the Ship Richard Robinson—Statement of One of the Officers of the Vessel.

In addition to the chapter of horrors which was recently published in relation to the treatment experienced by the crew of the American ship Richard Robinson on her voyage from Liverpool to New-York, we now have the sworn statement of the ship's carpenter, WALDERMER B. DEECK, who has been stopping at the Seamen's Home since the arrival of the vessel at this port. This man, having received better treatment from Captain ROBINSON and the first mate, during their drunken carnival of brutality at the beginning of the voyage, did not come forward with the crew to aid in the apprehension and prosecution of the fugitive officers; but it now appearing improbable that these officers will be arrested, he has made an affidavit containing many new and interesting facts, illustrative of the fantastic and brutal freaks practiced by the Captain and first mate. The statement of this comparitively disinterested person, an intelligent officer of the ship, will certainly command some consideration.

DEECK states that he joined the ship while she was lying at Holyhead, she having put back from Queenstown, as alleged by the Captain, for repairs. She remained at that port for fourteen days, when she was towed out to sea to a little below Tuscan, in complete repair. When the tug parted from the ship she took the captain's wife, who could no longer endure witnessing the savage brutalities of her husband and his first mate. While the tug was leaving the ship the inebriated captain compelled the crew to man the rigging and cheer his wife who was standing on the deck of the tug. The ship was then under sail during the preceding night and on the next morning the Captain hailed a tug to tow the ship back to Holyhead. While the ship was being towed back, the Captain and mate ordered DEECK, as he alleges, to cut away the bobstays, which caused the foremast-head to be sprung. The mate ordered him to go aloft and do something to the topsail yards, so they would come down by the run and be destroyed. DEECK told the mate that he could not consent to do such a thing. When the vessel arrived back at Holyhead, the Captain ordered a new main lower-topsail yard, as an excuse for putting back. The one on board he had condemned and ordered it taken down and all the iron work taken off. The same day the Captain went to Liverpool and returned on a steamer, bringing his wife with him. He came on board, and DEECK told him that two of the seamen had jumped overboard and got on shore, and that they had reported the ship to the police authorities. The Captain then went ashore to secure the men, but found they were being held by the authorities, who told the Captain and mate that they must appear before a Justice the next morning. The Captain came back to the ship and hurried her off to sea again. The old yard, which had been partially destroyed, had to be repaired and put in use again, as the Captain did not have time to get his new one in order. The tug which took the ship out, on leaving her, took off the Captain's wife, whereupon he again compelled the crew to man the rigging and cheer her as the tug was leaving. It was rather rough while the ship was coming down the Irish Channel, and the pumps worked heavily, and the Captain then said the pumps had gone. The ship put into Queenstown, claiming to be in distress, the Captain's excuse being that the pumps were bad, when, in fact, they were in good order; but the Captain wanted new ones, and told DEECK to go down in the pump-well and break and batter the pumps with a top-maul while they were being hoisted out, which DEECK says he did. When they were on deck, the mate, engineer and DEECK beat and battered the lead work of the pumps all to pieces, sawing the fragments away in the holes. New pumps were put in at Queenstown. The Captain's wife came on board again at Queenstown, and remained till the ship arrived at New-York. She did much toward protecting the crew from the Captain and mate, and finally put a stop to the cruelties by tossing all the liquor overboard. The mate, as DEECK alleges, compelled him, during the voyage, to break open a portion of the cargo, consisting of a case of very beautiful China ware, which he took aft to the cabin and presented to the Captain. DEECK alleges that he was compelled to do all these things by the Captain and mate, who threatened that if he did not do it, they would kill him. The mate also often compelled him to beat the seamen with a club, the mate standing over them, and saying that if DEECK did not beat them he would club him. The crew were fearfully beaten during the passage from Holyhead to Queenstown, and one man, to escape those brutalities, jumped overboard as the ship was leaving Holyhead the last time. It was blowing a strong breeze at that time and the weather was bitter cold. No effort was made to rescue the drowning man, who could not possibly have reached the shore, as he was very weak from the effects of having been badly beaten by the mate with an axe-handle, which was broken by the force of the blows, and he had just previously been confined to his bunk from the effect of his injuries unable to raise himself without assistance. It was thought at one time that a seaman named BROWN had jumped overboard, but about three weeks afterward he was found in the hold, almost dead, and when brought on deck the Captain tried him up to the forward galleys, keeping him there for a long time, together with a seaman who, it was ascertained, had cared for BROWN and given him food while the latter was secreted in the hold. In conclusion, DEECK states that the crew frequently complained of short provisions, and one day the Captain came to DEECK's workshop door and said, "Carpenter, you have plenty of shavings and sawdust, mix that and let the cook cook it and give them that and half a pound of beef, (which DEECK alleges was rotten)—that is good enough for a lot of hay makers." There was no pork for the crew, as the mate had exchanged it all for liquor and fish in Queenstown.

THE BILLIARD TOURNAMENT.

Sixth Day's Proceedings.

There were two noticeable defeats yesterday at Irving Hall. In the afternoon the contestants were JOHN DEERY and EDWARD DANIELS, the former playing his third game, and the latter his fourth. The first large run, 135, was made in the thirtieth inning, by DEERY, to whom it gave the lead. He never lost it, and in the fifty-ninth inning won by 349, averaging 20⅓. In addition to the 135 mentioned above, DEERY made a run of 210. DANIELS was unable to get above ninety. Not having been beaten, DEERY is equally a favorite with RUDOLPHE for the first prize; and should FOSTER not recover his lost form and beat them both, the diamond cue is certain to come into the possession either of the heretofore luckless DEERY or the eccentric Frenchman. Prior to opening yesterday afternoon's game, the score of which is appended, RUDOLPHE charmed the spectators with an exhibition of his inimitable coups fantastique, dispensing with the cue, and relying wholly upon his fingers. Without diagrams it would be impossible to describe the many antics which Monsieur, seemingly by a mere snap of the fingers, caused the balls to perform. Whether there are three balls on the table, or eight, is all the same, he handles both numbers with equal facility, and no matter what may be the opinion of his skill as a player of regular billiards, particularly the four-ball game, it is unquestioned that he is a perfect master of trick shots, and can accomplish with billiard balls all that any other French player can, and much more than any American. As he repeated the exhibition at night, his fancy strokes will doubtless constitute a part of the programme at every seance until the tourney closes.

Notwithstanding the storm, there was no diminution in the number of spectators at night, the attraction being the contest between the Chicago favorites, SNYDER and RUDOLPHE. Unusual interest was manifested by the players, among them being the latest arrival, JOHN SEEREITER, of Detroit. RUDOLPHE was in the best of humor, and atoned for the indiscretion he lapsed into on the occasion of his first appearance. Both men played splendidly, RUDOLPHE running ahead at times from 100 to 400 and upward, and SNYDER catching up. Each had made good runs, SNYDER crediting himself with 99, 168 and 192, and RUDOLPHE with 123 and 172. Skillfully conducted and stubborn as was SNYDER'S resistance, it was not, however, sufficient to overcome the superb play of his antagonist, who won by 114 points.

New-York Turnverein.

After the usual routine business had been dispensed with last evening, at a meeting of the above-mentioned Club, held at Turner Hall, Orchard-street, a discussion on the proposed reform of the school system followed.

Dr. GERKE read an extract from a memorial shortly to be laid before the Legislature, through a committee of citizens of New-York. Starting from the fact that the school system of the State leaves much to be desired, the memorial recommends a reform based on the educational system of Germany and Switzerland, and recommends especially the following reforms:

1. The principle of gratuitous public education as alone worthy of a democratic national school system.

2. The taxpayer having the right not only to get his own children educated, but, also, his expenses once being incurred, to demand that his neighbors' children should be educated also. An obligatory instruction is to be yet demonstrated; and all children from the age of 7 till 14 years are to be required to attend school.

3. The foundation of more public high-schools and seminaries for teachers.

4. For theoretical and practical reasons, regular instruction in the German language in all the public schools is advocated.

5. Instruction in gymnastics, for which sufficient space would be found in each of the present school buildings.

6. Stability in the position of public teachers, so that they may hold office as long as they discharge their duties efficiently.

It was remarked that while in the Germans contribute more than a fourth part of the expenses of public schools, they send their children mostly to private schools, because the public schools do not offer at present the required instruction.

During the discussion following Dr. GERKE'S paper, Mr. HERR MOSINGER proposed to invite other American clubs and societies to participate in the movement and to indorse the memorial when ready.

Mr. KUHN said the Germans in the West had successfully striven for the same reforms, and the Germans here must act with the same unity, in which case their fellow-citizens would be sure to give them their support in this question.

It was then resolved that the Turnverein indorse the above-mentioned memorial, and the meeting adjourned.

Maranon. Both the monitors were there in good condition, and all on board quite well. The Peruvian Consul states that at the time the report of the loss of the other monitor, the Atahualpa, was curculated, she was lying in the harbor of St. Thomas, where she has since remained.

Women's Medical College.

A lecture was to have taken place yesterday afternoon at the Women's Medical College, Second-avenue, corner of Twelfth-street, upon the "Social Evil." Owing to the rain there was but a very slight attendance, and Dr. CHARLOTTE LOZIER, the lecturer, postponed her discourse until 2 o'clock next Saturday, after which Dr. SARAH ELLIS will present a short address on a subject especially important to women. Mrs. MILLER will also speak at the College on Thursday, at the same hour. These three lectures will close the course of twenty that were announced. They have been very useful as a means of general instruction to women who do not follow medicine as a profession. They have gained some knowledge of their physical organizations, and learned means of averting many diseases. Another series of similar lectures will be given in September, before the regular course to students begins.

The Central Park.

The rain-storm which prevailed in the City yesterday, proved a serious disappointment to those who delight to spend the afternoon of Saturday amid the beauties of the Park. Of course, no one ventured out for pleasure, and the walks and drives were consequently deserted. A new and attractive feature has just been added to the Park, viz., a building which is to be used as a mineral spring. It is situated on elevated ground, midway between the Lake and the Green, and was constructed at a cost of over $40,000. It is of the Moorish design of architecture, and is decorated in the most elaborate manner. The panels of the walls are finished after the style of those of Steinway Hall, and are of brilliant finish. The designs and work were by the well-known artist, HENRY RECK, of Vienna. The architect is JULIUS HUNCKARTZ, and the carpenter, JAMES DALY. The building has been erected under the direction of the Commissioners by the firm of SCHULTZ & WARKER, the well-known mineral water manufacturers, and is now open to the public. Great credit is due to the Commissioners for the excellent service thus rendered to those who resort to the Park for the benefit of their health.

The New Postmaster.

The new Postmaster, General PATRICK HENRY JONES, took possession of the Post Office in this City yesterday. He visited the different departments in company with Ex-Postmaster KELLY, who explained to him their various workings, and introduced to him their superintendents. General JONES will enter upon his new duties to-morrow. He has, as yet, developed no plans of improvement. His removals will be gradual, and fewer, probably, in number, than usually take place in other departments of the public service. The duties of a large portion of the Post Office clerks are learned only by long experience, and removals among them create great public inconvenience. When they lose their positions it is usually through bad conduct or inefficiency.

Coroner's Cases.

The body of an unknown man, aged 30, was recovered yesterday in the East River, near Pier No. 28. Deceased had sandy whiskers and moustache, and there was a cut on the forehead. SCHMELL, a German, aged 32, who, while in the employ of the Erie Railroad Company, a few weeks ago, had an arm crushed by being run over by a gravel train. Death ensued on Friday night. A verdict of accidental death was rendered.

An inquest was held yesterday by Coroner KEENAN, on the body of a newly-born male child, which had been found in an old box on the sidewalk, near No. 1 Duane-street. The deceased had evidently been dead for several days. No trace of the wretches who abandoned the remains could be found.

The Morgue.

There was brought to the Morgue yesterday from No. 7 Park-place the body of an unknown man aged about 40 years, 5 feet 9 inches high, brown hair, sandy goatee, white muslin undershirt, white cotton overshirt, white drawers. The body has been placed in the Morgue for identification.

The body of an unknown man aged about 43 years, 5 feet 10 inches high, was brought to the Morgue last evening from Pier No. 28 East River. The deceased had brown hair, sandy whiskers, black sack coat, dark vest, plaid pants, gray flannel shirt. The body was too much decomposed to be placed in the Morgue.

The subject will be, "Free Trade—How it will Benefit the Workingman." On the 10th a mass meeting will be held at Cooper Institute, when W. CULLEN BRYANT and EDWARD ATKINSON will speak. On the 11th of May Mr. ATKINSON will speak in Philadelphia, in Concert Hall, on Chesnut-street, and on the 17th inst. there will be another meeting at the Brooklyn Athenæum.

Disasters at Sea.

The number of vessels belonging to or bound to or from ports in the United States, reported lost and missing during the month of March is 44, of which 17 were wrecked, 2 burnt, 9 abandoned, 2 sunk by collision, 5 foundered, and 9 are missing. A colored man named WILLIAM ELLSWORTH was committed for trial yesterday morning by Recorder MATHEWS, of Bergen, on a charge of having threatened to stab his employer, Mr. RICHARD WATERS, of Bayonne. While in a state of intoxication ELLSWORTH went to the house of WATERS and had a dispute with that gentleman, which ended in the darkey seizing a carving knife with which he attempted to kill the other, but missed him.

GEO. W. BLISS, paper hanger, and JAMES MORGAN, painter, both New-Yorkers, were brought before Recorder MARTINDALE, of Jersey City, yesterday morning, charged with having stolen a wallet containing $195 in bills, and a promissory note for $100, from ABRAHAM ACKERMAN, foreman of the Erie Railway Shop. On the evening of Friday, ACKERMAN, the prisoners, and a number of others, enjoyed themselves in a saloon in Pavonia-avenue. "For fun," MORGAN very adroitly lifted ACKERMAN'S watch and chain from his pocket, but again restored it. He repeated the operation a second time, but again gave back the watch and chain. About fifteen minutes after this second occurrence, ACKERMAN missed his wallet, containing money and a note which, however, were not restored; and, thinking the fun had gone too far, caused the arrest of the prisoners, one of whom, BLISS, he alleged to be a State Prison bird. They were committed for trial.

Early yesterday morning Detectives FISCHER and STRINGLIEB, while on patrol on Belmont-avenue, Newark, heard a signal given from the building occupied by MEYER, HOHN & KUCHTER, hat manufacturers. The officers, suspecting that thieves were at work, hid themselves from view, and awaited the progress of events. After patiently waiting for some time, the signals assured the officers that the thieves were ripe for capture, and a sudden descent was made, but unfortunately justice was robbed, as three of the thieves effected an escape, and only one was captured. At the time of the Police making an appearance the rogues had packed and removed to the sidewalk 139 hats, valued at $250.
